Free Classes for Families Living with Mental Health Issues

Mental health statistics indicate that one in five adults will deal with mental health challenges this year.

A nationally recognized class for families whose adult loved ones deal with mental health issues starts in September at three locations in Multnomah County.

The 12-week course, conducted by volunteers of the Multnomah Chapter of the National Alliance on Mental Illness (NAMI), is offered free of charge. Exact time and location will be provided upon registration. To register, call (503) 228-5692. Classes meet once a week for two and one-half hours at these locations:

- Monday evenings at Portland Veterans Administration Medical Center;
- Wednesday evenings at Legacy Good Samaritan Medical Center.
- Saturday mornings at Providence Portland Medical Center

The NAMI Family-to-Family class gets high marks from those who enroll; 99 percent say they feel more confident in dealing with their loved as a result of taking the class.

The course is designed for parents, spouses, children, siblings and friends of adults with mental health issues.

The curriculum, designed by a NAMI mental-health professional, is taught by specially trained volunteers whose own family members live with mental illness. Classes cover effective communication and problem-solving skills for family members; how to deal with a crisis; the biology of brain disorders; addiction disorders and mental illness; the criteria doctors use to diagnose the major mental illnesses; as well as up-to-date information on psychiatric medications, brain research and other issues.
