Harry, an army veteran who had a one-time bad-boy image but is now devoted to wounded veterans and charitable causes, met Markle on a blind date. The prince later said that's when he realized he needed to up his game to win her heart. They grew closer while camping in Botswana, and now there is talk of starting a family.

But for some Black women the engagement offered more than entertainment. It gave them a Cinderella story they could picture themselves in. Markle, who is divorced, is bi-racial and will be the first woman of color in modern history to join the British royal family.

"We all have this fantasy of being swept off our feet by the prince. It's validation that, of course, we can be princesses," Essence Magazine Editor-in-Chief Vanessa K. DeLuca said at the time.

Proud Americans

Manny Macias came to America when he was just 3 months old. Three decades later, he became a citizen of the only place he's called home.

"The U.S. has always been home for me," said Macias. "Now it's official."

The federal government says more than 600,000 people became naturalized U.S. citizens in the first nine months of 2017.

The ceremonies can be huge moments for those involved. Many times they are family affairs, complete with proud smiles or tears of joy as the newest Americans realize dreams that were years in the making. Many dress in their best and pose for photos while clutching American flags.

Macias, 31, said he's now glad to be able to vote, have more stability and live without fear of being deported.

"It was important to me to get the documentation saying I was a citizen," he said. "I did get a little emotional, because finally for me, the journey was done."
