

'Art Saved My Life' is an artist residency program that supports Portland-based Artists of Color to create works around healing from gentrification.

Residency Supports Artists of Color

'Art Saved My Life' will select three local artists to create works around community healing

By Melanie Sevcenko For The Skanner News

n a new twist on the 'artist residency,' a group of Portland creatives are launching 'Art Saved My Life' – a local program that supports Artists of Color who have been impacted by the city's decades-long struggle with gentrification, forced relocation and the kidnapped girls from the Government Girls Science and Technical College Dapchi who were released are being treated, in Dapchi, Nigeria,

See ART on page 3

Boko Haram Returns Nigeria Girls

page 10

August Wilson's 'Two Training Running' Comes to Portland

page /

MEYER'S NEW HOME

This lot at 2045 N. Vancouver will be the new headquarters of Meyer Memorial Trust, one of Oregon's largest philanthropic organizations. The foundation intends to relocate in March 2020.

Meyer Memorial Trust to Relocate in 2020

Foundation announces purchase of property on North Vancouver

By Christen McCurdy Of The Skanner News

Memorial Trust is moving to close-in North Portland.

The state's second largest foundation, which manages an $800 million endowment created by grocery-chain founder Fred Meyer, has announced its purchase of a 25.000-square-foot lot at the intersection of North Tillamook and Vancouver. Foundation CEO Doug Stamm, who retires at the end of April, said the organization will move into the new spot in March 2020.

Public records say the lot sold for $4.9 million in January. Foundation CEO Doug Stamm said Meyer's lease at its long-term office is coming to an end, and higher-ups started looking for a new location to house its increased staff. When Stamm started 16 years ago, the foundation employed 11 people; it now employs 43.

The 25,000-square-foot look like.

site currently hosts Sergeant's Towing, which had owned the property since 2000.

"We think it'll be an improvement over a tow yard," Stamm said. "Not too many people show up at the tow yard very happy, I can tell you that."

Meyer has engaged the development firm Project[^] and is in discussions with an architect. The foundation is also talking with community partners about what the end result should that can be a positive con-

Anyeley Hallová, a partner at Project[^], said the site was chosen partly for its proximity to transit and the availability of parking for partners driving in from elsewhere in the state. She also said Stamm and others stressed the importance of developing a site that wouldn't displace anyone from their homes.

"The conversation we've had has been less about what is on site but with Meyer being there, how

See MEYER on page 3

REPORT: One in Three Oregonians Struggle to Afford Housing

Housing crisis has hit renters especially hard

The Skanner News Staff

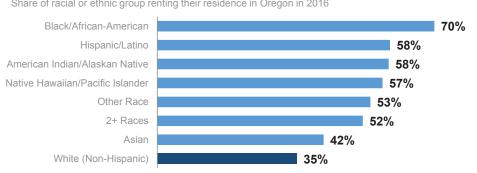

ne in three Oregon families struggle to afford housing, and renters have been hit especially hard, says a new report detailing the extent of the state's housing crisis.

Last week the Oregon Center for Public Policy found a quarter

See HOUSING on page 3

Oregon households of color more likely to rent

Share of racial or ethnic group renting their residence in Oregon in 2016

All groups have a statistically significant difference compared to white (non-Hispanic) households at the 90%

Source: OCPP analysis of Census Bureau American Community Survey data

OREGON CENTER FOR PUBLIC POLICY | OCPP.ORG