journalists.

Although Kampala was peaceful on Wednesday, riots were reported in the eastern town of Jinja, on Lake Victoria. Hundreds attended a special Mass in Uganda's main Roman Catholic cathedral to pray for Ssentamu's safety and that of other detained lawmakers.

"He isn't supposed to be locked up. He's supposed to be in hospital," Ssentamu's wife told the gathering.

Religious leaders have condemned the violence "in which lives are lost, people are barbarically arrested and tortured and property destroyed."

In a statement late Wednesday, Museveni accused "unprincipled politicians" of luring youth into rioting. Responding to calls on social media to #FreeBobiWine, the president said he had no power to release Ssentamu. "Let us therefore wait for the courts and see what they decide."

The lawmaker has quickly become popular with Uganda's mostly young population. Candidates whom he has campaigned for have defeated both the ruling party and established opposition parties. Some of his followers urge him to run for president.

"He is a constant thorn in the flesh of Museveni," said Rikki Stein, former manager for musician Fela Kuti, who said he met Ssentamu a couple of weeks ago and organized the open letter by musicians.

"Everybody responded literally immediately, horrified by what is taking place," Stein said. "We're hoping to make enough noise to get (Ssentamu) out."

Museveni, a U.S. ally on regional security, took power by force in 1986 and has since been elected five times. Although he has campaigned on his record of establishing peace and stability, some worry that those gains are being eroded the longer he stays in power.

The 74-year-old Museveni is now able to seek re-election in 2021 because parliament passed legislation last year removing a clause in the constitution that had prevented anyone over 75 from holding the presidency. Ssentamu publicly opposed that decision.

al voters similar to the one that carried Barack Obama to the presidency 10 years ago.

In Florida, Gillum defeated four other Democrats — none of them black — on Tuesday. While his campaign was outspent, Gillum was backed by millions of dollars in independent spending by Tom Steyer and George Soros, among the wealthiest supporters of liberal causes. Gillum prevailed in a state where blacks are about one-sixth of the population.

The political action committee New Florida Vision endorsed him in June and spent the next two months registering 19,000 new voters, knocking on 40,000 doors and reaching out to 200,000 people through text messages, mail or social media. The goal was to engage the kinds of black voters who helped Obama but didn't show up in the 2016 elections.

"Once it clicked for them that there was someone in the race focused on their interests," said Dwight Bulard, political director for New Florida Vision

PAC, "they were attracted to those ideas and the person who embodied them."
