Concurrently with KPMG's review, the Durkan Administration has also learned that the streetcar vehicles procured for the C3 are heavier and longer and have a different dynamic envelope than the existing SLU and First Hill streetcars. KPMG and SDOT recommended additional engineering analysis and design work to review necessary design changes to integrate the full streetcar system, including, but not limited to platform design, rail vehicle suitability (rail car length, weight and dynamic envelope) current platforms and C3 platform design. This work began August 2018 and will be used to develop a revised scope and cost estimate for the project and will continue into the Fall.

No final decision will be made by Mayor Durkan on the project until costs, feasibility, litigation risks, and community impacts are understood.

utes in length. These stories represent, in part, the day-to-day events that helped shape Portland from 1969 to 1981.

Beginning in the early 1960s, stations across the country started using 16mm film to document news outside the studio. With the ability to capture synchronized sound and a capacity to record up to 11 minutes per one 400-foot reel, 16mm film allowed for on-location reporting for the first time. Reels from the early 1960s were often shot on black-and-white negative stock, but as the decade wore on, stations shifted to color reversal film, often Kodak Ektachrome. The benefit of reversal stock was that there was no negative to process; the film in the camera was the image used for broadcast. Needing only to develop the camera original saved both time and money. Until the late 1970s, when analog video tape became more accessible, 16mm film was news stations' format of choice.

The prints in this exhibit are scans of camera originals that were donated by the news stations to OHS in the late 1980s.

City Releases Initial Summary of Independent Report on Seattle Streetcar

Following Mayor Jenny A. Durkan's order of an independent review of the Seattle Streetcar, the City of Seattle released an initial summary of findings for full transparency and accountability of anticipated capital costs as well as historical, current and future operating costs. In early March, the Mayor was notified that there were concerns about increases in capital and possible operating costs. Before moving forward on this project, Mayor Durkan wanted an independent review to answer the following questions:

- What are the capital costs of building the C3 streetcar?
- How much has the City spent on the project thus far? What would be the additional capital costs to not move forward?
- What are historical, current and forecasted operations and maintenance (O&M) costs of the SLU, First Hill and C3 streetcar lines?
- What are the historical and current ridership numbers and future ridership assumptions on the current lines and proposed C3?
- What are the long-term financial projections for the streetcar, including agency contributions and sponsorships?
- What are the risks to the City for moving forward? Not moving forward?
