Jordan cont'd

from pg 7

between African identity and the African diaspora.

"Making a movie, you rarely come out the other side the same. You either grow or regress. I came out a different man," says Coogler. "The conversation that was had between T'Challa and Killmonger, what it means to be African — I didn't know I needed that movie as much as I did until after I made it. I look back and I say: 'Man, I really needed that. I needed that conversation.'"

The performance has made Jordan one of this year's leading supporting actor contenders for the Academy Awards. Coogler praises his friend's vulnerability in a complicated role.

"He was one of the few African American characters and he was carrying the weight of that cultural representation," says Coogler. "Mike brings a lot of the empathy with him, as a person and as a performer. That's one of the things that makes him special. Almost as soon as you see him, you empathize with him."

Just as "Creed II" is opening in theaters, "Black Panther" is returning to them. On Nov. 27, it screens for free in arthouse theaters nationwide, a few months after wrapping up its $1.35 billion run worldwide.
