of our carry old meantime, overflowing ness of D'gger take It their houses would be the invisa density, a large proportion of the popula tion of the Chinese Empire are a low poverty and ignorance, giving to lying, steal ing, and breaking into the homes of others.
Now, this distinctly the class who come to Oregon a good, and degraded citizens, who have about as much knowledge of what is right, wrong, and in the view of God, as Dr.
Giger.

Besides, who do not engage in honest labor, but rely on the laws, and after the wielding of the vote, and crime, and misfortune, be the results of labor, and are a disgrace to the citizens of Oregon, and to their fathers in China. They are not content to be reformed, but are as anxious for mercy as the profligate and the vilest of their country.

Mr. E. R. Hewitt, in his book on "The Chinese," says, "The Chinese are very active. They do not stand on waiting for a blessing, but work for it. They are not content with what they have, but look forward to the future with an
desire to be better."

Surely, the Chinese are incapable of being so altered. There is no possibility of their being reformed. They are not content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the vilest of their country. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country.

Mr. E. R. Hewitt, in his book on "The Chinese," says, "The Chinese are very active. They do not stand on waiting for a blessing, but work for it. They are
not content with what they have, but
look forward to the future with an
desire to be better."

Surely, the Chinese are incapable of
being so altered. There is no possibility of
their being reformed. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country.

Mr. E. R. Hewitt, in his book on "The Chinese," says, "The Chinese are very active. They do not stand on waiting for a blessing, but work for it. They are
not content with what they have, but
look forward to the future with an
desire to be better."

Surely, the Chinese are incapable of
being so altered. There is no possibility of
their being reformed. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country.

Mr. E. R. Hewitt, in his book on "The Chinese," says, "The Chinese are very active. They do not stand on waiting for a blessing, but work for it. They are
not content with what they have, but
look forward to the future with an
desire to be better."

Surely, the Chinese are incapable of
being so altered. There is no possibility of
their being reformed. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country. They are not
content to be reformed, but are as anxious for
mercy as the profligate and the
vilest of their country.