The Scio Creamery Company has been quite busy during the past few weeks making cheese. They propose to make cheese altogether during the warm season, while butter is low in price, and in this way they will be able to pay the farmers more for their milk than though they made butter.

Fifty years ago scarcely 100,000 Chinese were living outside their own country. Thirty years ago Chinese emigration was estimated at 2,500,000, and ten years ago the number of Chinese living outside their own country had increased to 6,000,000, and today it is estimated that 10,000,000 Chinese are now living in other countries, over nine-tenths of them in Asiatic countries. Wherever they go in Asia they are so superior to the natives in energy industry and business faculty that they are absorbing a great deal of the retail and other trade of South Asia, as far west as Calcutta. They have created the prosperity of Singapore, own two-thirds of the real estate in that city, and provide some of the members of the Legislative Council of the British-governed settlement. Most of the coast trade from China to Burmah is in the hands of Chinese immigrants, who form three-fifths of the population of Bangkok, the capitol of Siam; comprise most of the artisans of Java, are prominent as retail merchants in the Philippines, 20,000 living in Manila. The Chinese are the leading commercial class in French Cochinchina, and are found in large numbers in the coast towns of Burmah. There are thousands of Chinese in Calcutta, where the shoemaking and carpenter trades are monopolized by them. The Chinese are next to the Japanese, the most energetic and enlightened of the Asiatic races and are really a better and more solid people in native business ability than the Japanese. The Japanese are warlike, while the Chinese have been educated to value peace and despise the arts of war. If the Chinese were a warlike as well as a commercial people, they would easily become the greatest people in all Asia.—Ex.
