Prof Weltmer, the "fake" healer, who advertises so liberally throughout the United States has recently been fined $1500 for using the mail for fraudulent purposes. Judge Phillips, in the U. S. district court in Kansas City, made the point that the professors extensive correspondence required all his attention and left no time for concentration of thought on the sufferings of his correspondents.

The Deschutes Echo, started at Bend for the timber land business, is to be tried at The Dalles, to establish the fact whether it is a real newspaper with a circulation or not. As the last number contains the notices 268 persons, for which it will receive $2,680 for ten weeks service, the question is a very serious one with the publisher of the paper. A number of Albany people have been requested to state whether they are real subscribers or not.—Albany Democrat.

The Marquise de Chambrum, the last daughter of Lafayette, died a few days ago at her home in Paris. Her life was notable for maintaining the family's cordial friendship for America. By her death her oldest son the Marquis de Chambrum, who is a member of the chamber of deputies, becomes the leading member of the Lafayette family. He and his second brother both have American wives. The third son represented the Lafayette family at the recent Rochambeau exercises in Washington.

The best paid mail carrier in the world is Oscar Fish, who receives $35,000 a year for making two trips a month between Valdez and Eagle, Alaska, a distance of a little over four hundred miles. This service is performed with a fine team of Eskimo dogs, and, although Mr. Fish has gone over precipices, encountered avalanches, been frostbitten, frozen and starved, he has always managed to reach his destination.

The Quarterly of the Oregon Historical Society, No. 3, Vol. 3, September, 1902, lies upon our table. As usual it is full of interest to all who care to know anything about the beginnings of things in Oregon, and what good citizen does not? Every copy of this quarterly should be carefully preserved. In a few years it will become invaluable to every student. It is sent to a large number of Historical societies and public libraries in Eastern states, and in this way largely assisting in making historic Oregon better known to the people of our land. Any one desiring to secure copies can do so by applying to Geo. H. Himes assistant secretary of the society, City Hall, Portland, Oregon.

An exchange says that a New York man making a tour of the West heard a number of corn stories and undertook to tell his friends in the East how it was. He told them that the streets in the Western towns were all paved, grains of corn being used for cobble stones; the cobs were split open and used for railroad ties, the husks when taken off whole were turned upside down and used for tents. The stalks were hollowed out and used for sewer pipes. He told them that the stalks grew to a height of 90 feet and when the ears of corn became ripe they were heavy enough to pull the stalk over so that they could be chopped off with an axe. Corn is king out west and don't you forget it.

The Redding Free Press announces the following but we would not recommend it to any one wishing food for dairy purposes: It will be remembered by readers of the Free Press that a miner placed some sticks of dynamite under a bush to dry, and several of Radcliffe's cows came along and swallowed the explosive. There was an immediate scattering of people whenever the cows put in an appearance, for there was no telling just when the bovines that contained the dynamite would blow up and send death and destruction to everything in their immediate vicinity. The cows blew up all right, but fortunately no one was injured. Mr Radcliffe has found the carcrsses of four or five cows, and he is confident they are the ones that ate the dynamite. Friday, while he was rounding up his stock, he ran across the carcasses The scattered bones proved to him beyond a doubt that the carcasses were those of the dynamite-eaters Just when they exploded no one knows, but people around Baird are now at ease and will not beat a hasty retreat at the approach of Radcliffe's milch cows.

Half Deer and Half Calf

The Manchester, N. H. Union, gives the following account of a very remarkable hybrid:

Another freak has arrived in Claremont. This time it is an animal which is part calf and part buck deer. It originated at the Weathersfield town farm, where the dam, a 2-year old Durham heifer, has been kept in a pasture which was frequently visited by a large buck deer: The offspring, when but a few weeks old, was put in an enclosure with an ordinary calf, and immediately there was a commotion, the freak almost killing the calf. It was then put in with a cow and a lively fight ensued. Its antics strongly resemble those of a frightened deer.

T. Nelson, the keeper of the farm became somewhat afraid of the freak, and when N. E. Angier of Claremont Junction came and offered him a price he quickly accepted, glad to get rid of the "nuisance." Mr. Angier and E. Norrington had a very entertaining time capturing and loading "Mr. Freak," finally doing so after Mr. Norrington had lost part of his clothing.

The animal was put in a box stall at the Junction house stables, where H. A. Willard wil break and tame him. For the first three days he would neither eat nor drink, but now he drinks milk and eats corn fodder. A stranger's visit to the stall will cause him to back into the corner and grind his teeth and strike with his feet. Mr. Willard is the only person whom he will allow to go near him.

Upon a close examination it was found that the animal's head is more deer than calf. The eyes are large and lustrous, with a pathetic expression. The distance from the eyes to the nose is long and pointed. Between the horns, which protrude about an inch and are more back on the head, it is full like a calf. The ears are like a deer's, being slim, with a little hair. The neck, too, is more calf-like, being broader than a deer's.

The tail, although long, is very flat. The legs are exceptionally clean and slim and the Indian bone, which is sometimes called the tooth-pick, and which is found only in the leg of a deer, is very plainly felt in the forward leg. The hoofs are small and pointed Its coat is a dark red and the grey hair is fast appearing on the rump and neck.

A casual observer would call the animal a calf, but upon a second glance the prominent deer features show themselves.

Bouden Mine Sold.

One of the largest transfers that has been made in these parts for some time, took plase last Saturday, when the Bouden mine and Braden mill became the property of Los Angeles and Redlands capitalists. S. W. McClendon and J. F. Jordan were the principal promoters of the sale. McDonough & Davis, the original owners of the mine have received their part of the money and the balance will be paid to Hon. J. J Houck in thirty days from date of sale.

The new owners of the mine are going to put in rew and heavier machinery, and the work of searching for the yellow metal will be dilligently prosecuted after the latest approved methods. This part of the country is coming to the front as a mining district, and such mines as the Bouden, and such methods as the new owners will doubtless use, will, in time, make Gold Hill the greatest mining center in Southern Oregon.

Notice.

Notice is hereby given that the partnership heretofore existing between Kellogg & Darling in the livery, transfer and blacksmith business, has this day by mutual consent dissolved. All debts contracted by and all debts due the firm will be paid and collected by them.

YVETTE

By S. RHETT ROMAN.

YOU SEE, one grows tired of life in the same grooves. Toujours perdrix gets to be monotonous," explained Ned Holcomb, while idly throwing small pieces of rock into the channel, where it ran around Rock point, and watching the play of sunshine and shadow over the water, as light clouds floated across the sky, driven slowly along by a south breeze, this calm April afternoon.

"Your queer, charming habitation, right out in the middle of the ocean, is so inaccessible and remote, it seems like a different world, from ordinary humdrum city life. What an ideal retreat, and how you must enjoy getting beyond people's reach, and away from sin and wickedness, and all uncharitableness," continued Holcomb, leaning back against the abutment of the lighthouse, and tilting his hat over his eyes to shade them from the slanting rays of the sun, gilding the vast expanse of the ocean, shining white on the rails of the fishing fleet, skimming homeward, and outlining the rigging and smokestacks of an ocean liner steaming in across the bar.

Yvette smiled a little wistfully, for the solitude of their storm-beaten eyrie, so alluring to Ned, as a relief from the whiz of electric cars, the jangling noises of the city and perpetual contact with humanity was sometimes oppressive to one so endowed with life and spirits as were the eternal wash and moan of the sea on the jagged rocks of the reef.

Then Yvette laughed, and, turning, looked with a frank gayety at Ned Holcomb.

"How long do you think you could live here, away from your friends and business; with just the sea to sing to you, and only the stars at night to tell you tales? What would you do with yourself all day, and in the evening?"

"I never said I'd like to live here without—any—companionship," Ned said, returning the frank look of Yvette's deep gray eyes, with one of open admiration, mingled with a friendliness Yvette had grown quite accustomed to by this time.

For since the visit of the Sea Gull, three months ago, to Rock Point lighthouse, Ned Holcomb had developed a great love of the sea, apparently, and had fallen into the habit of sailing far into the harbor, to do deep sea fishing on the outer rocks. Going or returning, he would stop at the lighthouse, to bring, as he had promised, papers and periodicals to Ben Ker, and books, Hylers and flowers, to Yvette, whose glad pleasure, so unrestrainedly expressed, produced a curious impression on their giver.

"There's a fascination about the sea," Yvette said, slowly, turning her gaze towards the far distant horizon, and ignoring her companion's last remark. "In the summer, you can't think how lovely the sea is out here. How pleasantly it whispers, and how sweetly the little waves drone one to sleep! I've sometimes thought it dreary, but how I will miss the dear old lighthouse! the never-ceasing sound of the waves, and the call of the sea gulls, and the salt spray in the air. How I love it all!"

"What do you mean?" queried Ned Holcomb, a curious pang running through him. "You are not thinking of going away?"

Yvette nodded slowly.

Ned Holcomb turned quickly, then paused in what he was going to say, for what business was it of his why Yvette and the old man, her father, should give up their care of the lighthouse and go—perhaps back to the little village on the Brittany coast, from which he had drifted years ago?

Why should he care if this beautiful girl went away from this lonely dwelling place, which she had made so bright and attractive; those rooms within the stone tower she had adorned and beautified until they seemed to Ned Holcomb to be an ideal spot on the earth's surface? Why in God's name should he care?

The lighthouse would be turned over to some rough seaman, and the beacon would shine just as well as when Ben Ker tended it with Yvette's help.

"He is much stronger and better since the warm spring days have come, but the doctor says he must not stay at the lighthouse another winter. Then—in June—I will go to live in the village on the island, but my darling old dad must come too. I would die if I were separated from him."

Again there was a pause, which Ned Holcomb filled up mentally by picturing what these jutting rocks would be without Yvette's presence.

"Why must you go to live on the island—in June?" Ned queried, without excusing the inquisitiveness of the inquiry.

"I am to—be—married in June." Yvette answered in a quiet, troubled voice.

"To whom?" Holcomb asked, roughly.

"A good man—Peter Stevenson," Yvette answered, turning to look out over the water, where the last golden sun rays were lingering before twilight would soften the crimsons and vivid purples of the sky to pale tints and fading grays.

"And—you care for him, of course? We have grown to be such good friends, have we not? I know you will not mind telling me," Ned Holcomb said, in a friendly voice, which had a queer ring in it. "You won't mind, you are so honest and straightforward."

"I've known him all my life," Yvette
