Well, Rather!

Many a time have we noticed that the much abused farmer generally knows how to take care of himself. Many a merchant has tried to pull off some little skin game on the poor farmer, only to find that the said farmers had stung the merchant with a vengeance. Now would it not be better if both parties had treated the other with business honesty and respect. It pays better dividends than many realize. Not many years ago a farmer sold a few potatoes to local people. It was at a time when potatoes were high and in great demand. The price paid was good for first class potatoes and the farmers should have delivered a first class article. He did, as far as it went, but when he filled the sacks he had placed a stovepipe in the sack and packed good potatoes all around the outside of the pipe, on the inside of the pipe he poured as many small potatoes as he could and placed large potatoes in the bottom and top of the sack. The purchaser was pleased at the extra fine looking sacks and did not find out about the deception until he started to use the contents. Do you think that farmer profited? In one way he did. He sold his potatoes and got the money, but do you think he could ever sell any more to the same people? No, of course not. Right there he failed as a business man. He killed his market. How many farmers do you know who have brot eggs to market that they would not set on their own tables? Many of these eggs were collected from nests that had been stolen away by some hen, and were of uncertain age. A hot drive to market and several days in a hot store and the product was not fit for use. The farmer had his money and the merchant had the eggs. The customer who bought this product was disgusted and complained to the merchant, who in turn blamed the farmer. This is another case where the farmer fell down and killed his business. Just a few moments taken to look and see would have given his trade the best eggs he had in stock. The merchant could have tested them too, but he perhaps took the farmers word for it. Does it pay to be dishonest?

If you can't speak well of this town, at least don't speak at all. Knocking does a fellow no good, does a town a lot of harm, and disgusts nearly everybody who hears it.

Every merchant in this town wants to sell you goods. You want to trade with the one who will do the best by you, who will sell you the best goods at the best price. It is up to you to read the ads in this paper, and it is up to the merchants to see that you read his ad. When you both do this you both win.
