

Oregon Ranks Second In Nat'l Safety Record

Gaining national recognition as a leader in highway safety, Oregon last month whittled down its traffic toll more than 42 per cent under that of October, 1934, adding to an already enviable reduction shown in latest reports from each state in the Union, according to the Oregon State Motor association, sponsor of the "Let's Quit Killing" traffic program.

Oregon's reduction in the first 10 months of this year has been 21%, meaning a saving of 54 lives, the motor association pointed out. National reports for the first nine months of 1935 show that the terrible death rate of 1934 continues unchecked and that the same number of highway fatalities occurred the first nine months of 1935 as occurred during the same period last year.

Of 23 states which have lowered their record of traffic fatalities this year, only Rhode Island surpasses Oregon, National Safety Council figures show. The tiny eastern state, with a population little more than two-thirds that of Oregon, showed a reduction of 31% at the end of the first nine months, while Oregon followed with a 16% drop in the same period.

Other states recording outstanding reductions were Delaware 15%, Massachusetts 14%, Illinois 12% (8 months only); Minnesota 11%; Missouri 10% (8 months only); Iowa 7% (8 months only); Florida 6% (8 months only); and Pennsylvania 5%. Twenty-five states showed an increase.

"Every motorist who has co-operated in Oregon's program of highway safety is to be congratulated on the reduction we have shown," said W. R. McDonald, director of the Oregon State Motor association in charge of safety. "We can be justly proud of our position among other states."

"It is probable that the next announcement of national traffic fatality figures will find Oregon even closer to the leading state, inasmuch as such a splendid reduction was made in October."

The secretary of state's figures show 33 deaths in October, 1934, and only 19 in the same month this year. Fatalities for the 10-month period of last year totaled 258, while this year they numbered only 204.

"This decrease, I believe, can be attributed directly to Oregon's extensive program of safety education," McDonald added. "It is definite indication that the serious problem can be solved."

"We can not, however, allow ourselves to be content with this reduction. All accidents are avoidable. There is no need for loss of life on our streets and highways. If every motorist continues to help, we can prevent the wasting of human lives."

That the development of mutual understanding and cooperation between cities and the rural sections will do much toward the up-building of both.

It would soon show the city man that the farmer is a business man who is planning and working at all times to develop the business of farming. He is a real neighbor and does his own share for the betterment of the whole community.

It will show the farmer that the city man is always willing to do his share.

The cities and the country face the same big problem—that of building up their community. Enlightened men should cooperate together to success—a success that ignores selfishness and works only to the common good of the whole community.

No Hero

As soon as the luxury liner reached the open sea she began to roll and pitch. One traveler, going below, found his friend in a woman's nightgown, with a lacy nightcap on his head.
"Heavens, man! he exclaimed when his friend called him back.
"What's the idea?"
"Read the rules," exclaimed the other, hopefully. "In case of disaster, women and children first."
