Greatest Travel Hazards Lurk on Nation's Hiways

This is a story that figures tell better than words.

It has to do with the relative safety of the modern methods of overland travel—automobile, the airplane and the railroad.

Statistics prove the highways more hazardous than the airways or the rails, according to M. J. Gormley, executive assistant of the Association of American Railroads.

On the highways, for every 20,000,000 miles traveled, one person is killed; over the airways for every 24,000,000 passenger miles one is killed, while over the rails, only one fatality is recorded in every 400,000,000 passenger miles, Gormley said.

The figures prove rail transportation 20 times safer than highway and 16 2-3 times safer than by air, according to Gormley.
