vest carnival, of which one is to be given in Pendleton, September 18 to 22:

"Several years ago, in Ashtabula, Ohio, the old county fair association found itself financially embarrassed, with a mortgage on the grounds. A wealthy man who held the mortgage foreclosed it and took possession, refusing to yield it up again, unless paid a sum of monoey, which it was impossible for the fair association to raise. There was a disposition to feel indignant at the action of the gentlemen in question, who took advantage of some technical leverage upon them in a legal way, and at a local meeting held to close up the affairs of the association, or find out what they should do, some one exclaimed: 'Let's give the fair in the street,' The remark was not really made in a serious vein but some of the members of the society took it up, and soon the idea gained prevalency that it was a teasible plan. That year, under stress of circumstances in the loss of their fair grounds, they gave an exhibition in the streets exactly like they would have given had they held it within the enclosed grounds they formerly used.

"The next year they began to eliminate some of the old county fair features and to add some that were copied from the European fetes and festivals.
