A small boy at Milton Sunday morning raised havoc with one of the windows of a passenger coach on the regular train as it was pulling out. The missile used was an apple, for which Milton is famous. The glass was broken and the apple nearly struck a lady who was sitting in the seat next to the window. The train was backed up and the name of the boy was noted down by the conductor for future reference. The boy himself speeded away so rapidly that he could not be caught just then.

Pierce, who came home from Nome City, arriving in Seattle on September 27, left Pendleton on the afternoon train for Milton and goes on to Walla Walla to take the night train for San Francisco. Mr. Pierce left some on September 18. He saved his slinging outfit from the terrible storm that devastated the beach, and now has the only steam slinging plant in the district. Mr. Pierce intends to return to Nome, spring January, going by steamer to Katmai on Cook's Inlet, and thence by dog team, 800 miles across the peninsula to the camp. "I look for a quiet season next year," said he, "but think that two years hence Nome will enjoy a tremendous boom. By that time titles will have been straightened out. During the coming 20 years the Nome district will produce more gold than any other locality on earth."

BACK FROM THE EAST. In the Great Central West—People Who Long to Be Back in Oregon—The Convention of Locomotive Firemen.

Kameha, Sept. 30.—After a sojourn of twenty days in the great "Central West," among the thrifty and progressive lowlands, I gladly take up my soap again, content with the blessing and shortness of Oregon. There is some indefinable fascination about the west, which grows up around us, so strong, so enduring, and yet so tender. It is second nature for a man who has once lived here, to want to return, if he wanders away. Why it is, or why it should constitute any part of the destiny of Oregonians, is outside the scope of this article to inquire, but that it does exist, and is a potent factor in our lives and fortunes, goes unquestioned.

While in the city of Des Moines, I met eleven separate individuals who had resided at different times in different parts of Oregon. Each of these assured me that as soon as they could dispose of interests in Iowa, they would immediately return to Oregon, there to reside permanently. To my inquiry as to their main reason for so doing, each gave a different answer.

One just simply loved the West,—her ways, her people and her resources. Another sought health; another wanted to get rich in her inexhaustible mineral districts. One loved her numerous variety of occupation. One new fortunes awaiting him in her business, filled and loving herds. Another wanted to raise wheat. One could teach school, and saw in Oregon an open doorway to eminence for every worthy aspirant. One old maid remarked that it was an honor to grow up among such splendid surroundings as the coming man of the Pacific coast. And one old lady, who had seven married daughters in our beloved state, was anxious to return to take care of her daughters and their families, as four of her sons in law, were in the penitentiary, two were running for presidential electors on the prohibition ticket and one had just published his fourteenth newspaper in the interest of some "boom" town.

Blessed Oregon! My native land, Once more I lay my heart to thee! One more thy dear, intelligent soil, The anxious friend, my home shall be.

The hills and dales that saw me spring From childhood to the stern estate— Those hills my dreams—ah, gently ding— Thy blessing found by ascribing state.

The mission of the seventh biennial convention of the Locomotive Firemen is fulfilled. It remains to be seen if our councillors were wise and our actions toward the end of justice. The problems which came before our meeting are not being discussed by the fireman alone, but the civilization of the grandest country is struggling to settle them in some intelligent manner for the best interests of humanity.

We are simply one of the minute agencies of human government working out in our peculiar calling and in our best way, the tangled web of human destiny, ever striving to rebuild, in wisdom and justice, the condition of the world. Whatever we accomplish for the general good, whatever we add to the betterment of our craft and kind, are only drops added to the vast ocean of human progress, and that our efforts toward the lawning of that radiant dawn, when those who hire and those who are hired, shall walk together as brothers, in the sunlight of understanding, that these efforts and hopes be not in vain, we lay down the good once more. The field in which we labor, the perils and hardships which we are more or less unfortunately occupied, we extend the fraternal hand to all. What concerns one laborer in another field, concerns us, also. In no preceding presidential campaign within our memory, has there been such a dearth of argument and excitement. It is a campaign of thought. In the east we notice the same general spirit of speechlessness, which prevails in the west. The little groups of men on the street corners are not discussing politics. The question was hardly mentioned on the train over the entire 1800 miles from Los Angeles to Kameha. Old "war horses" who usually "felt their oats" about this time, have so little to say, that we await in wonder and surprise, the intellectual feast which it is hoped they are yet to spread. If this silence is all golden, "I can't be losing. But when powerfully thought and resolve the great problems over and over, in silence, aside from the enthusiasm of spread eagle speeches, and campaign elixir of life, their conclusions are generally founded upon reason and logic, and we do not fear the judgment thus rendered.

Autumn, the widow among the seasons, is here in her weeds. Her whole story is that of partings and farewells. She is the mourner, whose breath among the barren tree tops, makes one lonely. It is she who whispers in the distant moan of the rising storm, and sends the little child to peep closer to its mother's breast. It is her hand that strikes down the lingering blossom, and casts it upon the heap of leaves to perish. She is the spectre who passes through the forest paths, and strips them of their grandeur. She sends the songsters away from their nests, and stymies their ministry with something which is not a song, and yet so near it, that we hesitate to call it might else.

BARELY ESCAPED. Joe Connelly Run Into by a Team of Horses Hitched to a Cab.

Joe Connelly returned last night on the delayed train from Wilbur, where he had been looking after his stock interests. It was nearly 1 o'clock this morning when he was wending his way home from the depot. He was walking up Court street, and when on the crossing at Cottonwood street, was run into by the Depot stable cab team driven by Percy Cross. Mr. Connelly says he was tired and sleepy and that apparently the cab driver was in the same condition. The team turned the corner under the control of their stable, and seemed to be in a big hurry to get home. Mr. Connelly grabbed the neckyoke and pole of the cab and yelled "Whoa," good and loud at the horses. The driver pulled them up, but not until Mr. Connelly had been pushed along 15 or 20 feet by the momentum. He was indeed fortunate that he was not knocked down at first, so he could not grasp the neckyoke, or his injuries might have been serious.
