DEMISE OF JACOB FRAZER

Gradually, the pioneers pass away, leaving memory of their vigorous deeds in days when men had strong hearts and were not appalled at danger. Young men and women are prone to forget that that which we now enjoy was built on foundations laid by hardy early settlers who conquered a wilderness and wrested the land from aboriginal savages.

Jacob Frazer, whose demise occurred on Monday afternoon, was one of the pioneers. He was here when only raw the hands that shaped the destinies of for this town. the community in which he lived.

Of late years, until a year or two past, his step grown feeble, he was seen on Pendieton's streets, unable to dame, the matron with her children, participate in the stirring events of the day. Only reminiscence remained of the time when he was one of the chief luctors in the life of the town and county.

The community, rushing on with new plans and new ideas, left the old man beside the road, sadly realizing that he was no more of, although he was in, the world,

He was in a measure forgotten. Newcomers added to the numbers living in Pendleton. People came from other sections and found ready at hand a place of thrift and enterprise.

As too often is the case, the pioneer was overlooked. They knew not of his one-time energy and ability, his eager planning of a great future for shop where he was employed. There shop where he was employed. There was fittle else, and the years that he labored there were hard years, and yet, they never seemed hard or wearled him. He lived two lives, the life of toil and the life of dreams; and, if the one was hard, the joys of the other made him forget the hardness.

It was slow progress in the village. But, when he reached the city, he felt himself in the great arena where he must fight for his life. And he fought must fight for his life. And he fought well. Industrious, economical, honest, and yet not too scrupulous, his whole nature concentrated and poised for the struggie, he was sure to succeed. More quickly than he had thought, men marked him as one of the struggiers who was to win his way, and, when at her the sourced to take a day or to last he ventured to take a day or to that he might visit the old village, he found himself the central figure. Even the squire's daughter looked curiously at the young man who bore himself with such a confident air, as one who had gained a standing place, and yet who had been such a short time ago the raggedest boy on the village atroats

And, when they spoke together, she wondered afterwards what it was, that look he gave her, as though he had taken possession of her very soul. Ab! how wise he had been. How carefully he had planned to gradually attach her to himself. Surely, never had man fought more magnificently to win fair and endurance furnish. It is a healthful sign.
