ARGUE CONSTITUTIONALITY

The Primary Laws Passed by the Last Legislature on Trial.
Portland, June 19.—Before the four circuit judges, Frazier, Sears, George and Cleland, sitting in bank, the constitutionality of the primary laws passed at the last session of the legislature will be argued Friday. Wallace McCannant, representing, in reality the republicans, will argue against and District Attorney Chamberlain for the laws. The defense will raise a point that the two primary laws cannot be tested in one case, and this may be upheld by the judges. In a nutshell, McCannant contends that the principal law is unconstitutional because it applies only to Multnomah county, being optional with the other counties. There is a strong feeling in favor of the primary laws on the part of the followers of Senator Mitchell and the democrats. Both of the primary laws in question were drafted by Mitchell and were passed through the legislature by democratic votes. On the other hand, the republicans declare that they are in favor of a primary law but assert that those passed at Salem last winter are not models and would merely put Multnomah county to a great expense without accomplishing any material results. There promises to be a long contest over these laws which may not be definitely settled until it is time for them to become operative.
