TAYLOR DID NOT HELP OUT SCHLEY

Testified Regarding the Movements of the Brooklyn.

SAYS SHE GOT OUT OF BATTLE LINE

Raynor Failed to Gain a Much Desired Point in the Introduction of Some Testimony.

Washington, Oct. 9.—The morning session of the Schley court opened with Lieut. Bristol, watch officer on the Texas during the war, still on the stand. He gave his opinion again that the stadimeter is a very unreliable instrument for measuring distance.

Rear-Admiral Taylor, who commanded the Indiana during the war, testified that fifteen minutes after the battle began his signal official said: "The Brooklyn must be injured. She is dropping out of the action." He saw the Brooklyn heading south about a quarter of a mile outside the line of the American column. It was not turning so far as he could see. He could not tell how close together the Brooklyn and Texas were. He said there was no attempt on the part of the Spanish ships to ram the Brooklyn.

Here Raynor attempted to introduce the signals made by Sampson in which he said before departing for Sibony the day of the battle to ignore his movements. Lemley succeeded in preventing their introduction. Raynor wanted to introduce them to show that Schley was absolute commander of the fleet when the battle took place.

ROUGH TRIP FROM ALASKA.

Portland Man Registers a Protest Against the Steamer Service.

Portland, Oct. 9.—St. Louis, a well known barber, arrived here this morning from Seattle. He was a passenger on the Oregon on her last trip down from Alaska and he says that the trip was one that will never be forgotten by the passengers. In the first place, the steamer carried more passengers than the law allowed. There was only enough provisions on board for the regular number, supposing the trip to take eight days. As it was, the rudder broke when they were out a few days and it was eighteen days from the time the vessel left Alaska until she landed in Seattle, and it would have been a great deal longer if the Oregon had not sighted the Empress of India and procured materials with which to repair the rudder.

Long says that the provisions furnished by the ship were not fit to eat. All they had was two meals a day. For breakfast a little mush and dry bread; for dinner, coffee, a handful of rice and stale bread. For several days all they had was dry hard-tack and coffee that was not eatable. When the Oregon reached Seattle the passengers were almost starved.
