With Clay, he followed General Taylor to Monterey, to Fort Brown, to Buena Vista. Here, when General Taylor struck down the Mexican robel-lion, Henry Clay was killed, February 23, 1847. Wher the fatal shot struck, Admiral Nelson Owens was close by and the last words of Clay were heard by him. In the same struggle, Jefferson Davis was engineer, and after the shooting began, the men realized that Davis had ranged his guns too high to touch the enemy. Owens, who was with Artillery Battery No. 3, rushed to Davis and told him that with his guns he could offer the that with his guns he could effect nothing. In a few moments, the guns were lowered and winnows of dead Mexicans lined the paths of the "Just then I saw a white streak shoot out from the smoke of battle. It was the Oregon, racing like a greyhound to overtake the Spaniards," was the tribute of Schley to the greatest battle ship ever built. "There was the Brooklyn, only an armored cruiser, engaging all four Spanish ships, the Colon, the Viscaya, the Oquenda and the Maria Teresa, and receiving the concentrated fire of all," was the tribute Capt. Clark of the Oregon paid to Schley's flagship. Such compliments are historical and these epigrams will often be repeated by the American youth in after years in recounting the glory of our navy in 1898.
