FARMERS STUDY THE WORLD'S WHEAT MARKETS

They are inclined to think values will go higher—growers are in independent position, and can hold if they desire so to do, for a long time. The farmers hereabouts have been studying the wheat reports, and think that the future holds great possibilities. Local growers are distinctly bullish just now and figure that values are really more than are offered by the buyers.

On the other hand, the buyers state that the conditions do not justify paying even so much as has been paid during the past few days, and that the bulge occurring last Saturday was due to local speculation on the coast. It is the old question of guessing at what the wheat market will do, and this is a species of prophesying that has never been reduced to an exact science by either buyer or grower.

It cannot be denied that the world's situation shows some fine indications for the augmentation of values, and the person who bets that wheat will go up seems to have the probabilities on his side. But, so the majority think who have been seen by this paper, the coast buyers are paying all the market now affords, and are sufficiently anxious to get grain to insure plenty of competition between the various houses represented in Pendleton.

Farmers independent. An element in the situation is the independent farmer, who is able to hold if he wants to. And those independent growers are numerous in this country. Many of them can draw their checks for amounts requiring four figures to express them, and these checks would be honored at any bank in the county or in the state.

ADAMS FARMERS' VIEWS.

James Lieualten Thinks They Generally Look for Higher Prices. J. T. Lieualten, who was in the city yesterday from his home in Adams, stated that the farmers of that section had not disposed of much of their wheat in the last spurt in prices. He says that they are of the opinion that it will reach a still higher mark. A great many, he says, do not think that the local markets are keeping up with the eastern markets, and they are somewhat reluctant to let loose while the eastern markets are still on the upward tendency, preferring to hold and risk getting more.
