BETTER IRRIGATION LAWS.

Senator Stewart Will Endeavor to Give the Courts Jurisdiction.

Hon. William H. Stewart, of Nevada, has taken up the fight to give the courts jurisdiction in water-right controversies growing out of irri-tion uses of streams flowing through several states.

The head waters of dozens of streams flowing into the great arid land states of the West and Southwest are found in Colorado. The people of that state can divert waters that mean life or death to other states.

In the small New England states a single river like the Connecticut runs through several commonwealths. Yet each state can by its own laws do as it pleases with such a stream.

To remedy this an amendment is necessary to give the federal courts, through congress, jurisdiction in law and equity relating to the use of water except where the water and the use are in the same state.

Where the flowing water of a river is in one state and the use of it is needed in another state for irrigation, the courts must be given power to try the rights involved between the people of the two states.

Senator Stewart has raised an important question, and this movement seems necessary, as congress can have no power over this matter except by a constitutional amendment, clarifying its powers.

Congress is exactly opposite from a state legislature in this respect, as the federal constitution is a grant of powers, while the constitution of a state is a limitation of powers.
