HENS WERE ON A STRIKE.

Shortage in the Egg Supply is Now Over—Walla Walla Man's Strategy.

Newspaper reports from many of the adjoining towns are to the effect that the hens were on a strike and an egg famine had been narrowly averted. In Walla Walla eggs have been as high as 40 cents per dozen and very few could be bought at that. In Spokane they reached 45 cents, but 35 cents is the highest mark they have reached here. For a few weeks during the recent cold snap, the hens refused to lay and the housewives were at a loss to know whether or not they would have to forego the use of eggs for the family breakfast, but this only lasted for a short time and now they are plentiful at 30 cents per dozen, with a lower tendency, but had the cold weather lasted much longer there would undoubtedly have been a scarcity, as the hens were thinking about going on a general strike when winter broke up and the balmy weather of the past two weeks has brought them back to their work again.

Had it remained cold, some of Pendleton's poultrymen might have been trying the experiment which, according to the Statesman, was worked a few years ago by a prominent chicken man and lawyer of Walla Walla. The lawyer had a nice lot of hens that were doing their work in a satisfactory manner at least in their opinion. In the way of furnishing nice fat eggs for their master. The lawyer thought otherwise and proceeded to try an experiment that worked to perfection, though with sad results to his chickens. He had two electric light wires strung from his house to his hen house. To the wires were attached 32-candle-power incandescent lights. After the chickens went to roost at night, along about 10 o'clock, the lawyer would slip out quietly and turn on one of the lights. The chickens would awaken and think dawn was breaking and the roosters would begin their usual crowing. In a half hour or so the other light was turned on and the chickens would think it was daylight. The hens would begin the supposed day's work with the result that the lawyer's income was increased double, in the way of eggs. This was kept up for some time until one morning the lawyer found nearly all his hens dead from overwork. This settled the matter and the lawyer took out his lights, concluding the experiment was too costly.

Chickens are quite scarce in the Pendleton market and are commanding a higher price than for several years. They are being sold at $4 a dozen and enough cannot be had at this figure to supply half the demand.

The "Eleventh Hour" Fraud.

Lincoln J. Carter's melodrama, "The Eleventh Hour," which was presented at the Frazer Saturday night to a good house, disappointed all present. In the first place, all the acts were cut short so the players could catch the 11:20 O. R. & N. train out and one act was left out entirely. In cutting the part that they attempted to present, it was "butchered" until very little was left of the play and it fell so far short of what was expected that those who witnessed it were thoroughly disgusted. The troupe was very weak and each played the part with the appearance of having no life or vigor and did not care how he appeared just so he got his part off his hands. The scenery was the only redeeming feature, and especially was the stage elaborately decorated for the last act, but when people pay their money to see a drama that has the name of being a good production, they do not care to be unfooled and the next time Mr. Carter's "Eleventh Hour" comes this way it will receive a cold welcome.
