DEMOCRATIC WAY

SCENE WHICH TOOK PLACE IN DEMOCRATIC CONVENTION

John E. Lathrop's Narrow Escape From the Awful Fate of Being a United States Senator.

The Portland Telegram gives the following account of an interesting scene in the state democratic convention recently held in that city: There are more interesting diverting sidelights in a democratic convention in an hour's time than in three times that in the ordinary conventions of other parties. No gag rule goes in a democratic convention. Free speech must be accorded every delegate, for he comes from Way-back to be heard, and parliamentary rules must wait on his fervid eloquence.

Not Down on the Bills.

Thus, last Friday afternoon the chairman accepted a motion to adjourn no less than half a dozen times before the act was finally accomplished by a roaring aye. Each time as the putting of the vote was about to be reached some delegate would suddenly loom in the haze of copious smoke and beg to get in one more word to taper off things. In some cases the mover of the motion to adjourn would courteously withdraw his motion, impatient though all of them were to start for home. All business had been done but all chance was given to the delegates to get in a word.

There was probably no more diverting and humorous feature of the day of shouting Friday than the brief, fretted senatorial boom of the stalwart, prepossessing newspaper man of Pendleton, John E. Lathrop, good fellow. Mr. Lathrop is one of the editors of the East Oregonian. By whomsoever known he is liked. He is a first-class newspaper man. Like all the tribe of scribes, John is modest. Unlike most of the tribe, he can talk as well as write when it will do the most good. It was an illustration of this fact that was observed during the proceedings late in the day.

Mr. Lathrop was on the stage with other reporters in the capacity of "covering" the convention for his paper. In the go-as-you-please order of business a lull occurred. Lulls were frequent. And when there was a lull that meant a speech.

Began as a Joke.

It began as a joke. Yet there was no occasion for treating it as a joke. R. G. Smith, the young silver-tongued orator of Josephine county was enthusiastically called for. He took off his top coat and frowned. He marched upon the platform and, leading off with his right, he jabbed the aristocracy idea once favored by Washington. From Thomas Jefferson to the plutocracy of this prosperous period of republican rule he oscillated with force, brevity, good sense and eloquence that eminently satisfied the war horses of the party.

"While I am on the rostrum," Mr. Smith suddenly suggested, "will you allow me to name a favorite son for indorsement for United States senator?"

"Yes! yes! yes!" came shouts from the hall, "Go 'wan! Warm it up! Go 'wan!"

Mr. Smith said that upon looking over the field he saw no more promising or likely young man for senator than John E. Lathrop. His eloquence of the young editor was in taste. But it struck Lathrop like a thunderbolt. The convention shouted. Lathrop looked up from his work.

"Rot!" he commented, briefly. "What joke is this?" And then the editor's sense of the ridiculous helped him out. He laughed. Half a dozen friends pushed him into his seat, from which he was about to rise in protest. They told him to keep still.

The lion-like tones of O'Day were heard seconding the nomination.

Lathrop to the Front.

At this point Lathrop got to the front of the platform and claimed attention.

"I guess I am about the only man in this convention who was up before 10 o'clock this morning," he began. "The first thing I did was to take a ride on the cable up to the Heights. As I glided up from terrace to terrace I reveled in the beauties of nature unfolded to view in the valley below. It was grand, inspiring up there. And while, gentlemen of the convention I enjoyed keenly the rare sights of that exalted place, I did not then dream, nor do I now dream, of aspiring to the still grander, more glorious heights to which you tender me. I take it as a compliment and nothing more—from my oldtime friend Smith. Smith means well. He sticks to his friends always. That's all. While in my humble way I have endeavored to do all I can for the party and its representatives, I do not think it is for me to accept this great honor at your hands.

"Of course," Lathrop continued, as he went to his seat, "this is merely a compliment from Smith, and it is understood it goes no further."

The convention laughed with the editor and cheered him all the way along. His nomination for editor was seconded two or three times more. All this time Lathrop was enjoying the humor of the situation. Then C. E. S. Wood was nominated, and seconding remarks were heard from several country delegations. Finally T. H. Crawford spoke. While duly sensible of the sterling qualities of the Pendleton editor, which eminently qualified him for the position of senator, yet, Mr. Crawford said, they must perforce think of other reasons why Mr. Wood, literary man, lawyer, critic, should be named and chosen to carry the banner.

"Eastern Oregon is fully represented already on the ticket," Mr. Crawford said, "and I favor Mr. Wood."

Editor Lathrop came to the front. He held up his hands in mock despair. The convention shouted. "That does settle it," the editor said. "My little boom meant to grow so heartily, is punctured. I therefore squelch the aspirations which have budded within 10 minutes, and with more or less regret for the hopes of the serried ranks of my support"—here he gave a backward glance at the smiling faces of half a dozen reporters—"I withdraw as a candidate. Mr. Crawford has punctured the boom completely. It is the last straw. It is the fatal blow from a man whom I have puffed" (roars, laughter and cheers) "in the paper; a man to whom I have paid undeserved tributes and accredited him with virtues he never knew." (Laughter.) "He should have been exorcised with a pen dipped in sulphur, instead. Tom Crawford has spoken, gentlemen, and the camel's back is broken by this bolt from my support. There is Bill Matlock yet; give him a chance!"

In the midst of continued laughter over the brilliant onslaught, Wood's nomination was put through according to the regular order.

A POSSIBILITY

That Became a Fact and Pleases Many Bald People.

A. R. Lewis, M. D., in a lengthy article in the columns of the American Journal of Health, says concerning hair: "It's deterioration is a constant source of worryment to humanity, consequently bald people are easily deceived by 'fake' hair restoratives. The wish that a hair preparation will 'fill the bill' is father to the fancy that it is likely to do so. A rare case in point is that of Newbros' Herpicles, which actually does 'fill the bill.' It destroys the parasite that attacks the hair root, and prevents dandruff, falling hair and baldness."
