THE MODERN DRUGGISTS - PENDLETON

East Oregonian

WEDNESDAY, JULY 30, 1902.

KILLED BY PREJUDICE.

One of the greatest heroes of the recent war with Spain has been killed outright, as a hero. He still lives as a citizen, but as a hero he is not only dead but scorned of all men. It was all brought about through the prejudice of his fellow men.

Lieutenant Hobson is referred to That Hobson was one of the greatest heroes of the Spanish-American war, there is no question. Unselfish, without thought of his own life, he willingly undertook to perform a duty for his country that bore the appearance of good fruits, that looked to all men as one of the most hazardous acts in modern times. No one who saw Hobson and his companions start into the harbor on board the Merrimac, a veritable infernal machine, ever expected to see either of them again. Hobson did not even think to prepare a means of escape. He was so intent on his errand for his country that he did not think of his life.

That was heroism. His act was commended as such throughout the world.

But as a hero Hobson was doomed to fall. He was young. He was handsome. There was a woman in the case. There were several. There were scores. They kissed him. It killed him, as a hero. Why? Where is the young man, the handsome young man, that would have refused? It would have been ungallant. Besides, it was pleasant. Hobson was the symbol of gallantry. He was human. He liked good things. He yielded his cheek. Then the other cheek. His lips! But in that kiss—those kisses, was death to the hero. Only poor, scorned Hobson was left. But why? It was all jealousy. It is charged that this terrible failing belongs alone to women, but it is not so—at least it was not so in Hobson's case. All men rose up against Hobson. He had kissed, permitted women to kiss him!

How awful! Where is there a man that would permit such a thing? So degrading! The newspaper men were foremost in condemning him. They gave him the first stab and the last. They could not bear the thought of a man committing such a crime. A hero may run for president, or give away the property to his wife presented by a grateful public, and be forgiven, but for the crime of kissing, never!

It was all brought about by jealousy. It made every man mad who heard about it. For one man to receive such attention from the fair sex was more than other men could bear. As one man they rose up against Hobson. His valiant services for the country were forgotten in a moment. They even say it was a schoolboy trick that any one could have done. They would not have stooped so low as to merely sink a ship. They would have taken the whole works. They killed him as a hero. He is now the object of general scorn. And still these jealous men are not satisfied. Especially the editors. They still jab the hero corpse with their poignant pens!

While the papers at the different cities composing the Inland Empire Baseball league are abusing home players, the East Oregonian is looking on approvingly at the Pendleton aggregation as it continues to bring home scalp after scalp of the much-abused victims. It is not the poor playing of your men, gentlemen, it is the good playing of the Pendleton men that is winning. Encourage your boys instead of continually fussing at them. You "rattle" them as badly as you are "rattled" yourselves.

It is very unlucky nowadays to bear the name of Tracy unless it be the Great Harry. One Tracy was recently killed in California, another nearly beaten to death at another place, and a man took a shot at a fellow named Tracy at Walla Walla the other night.

It appears that Attorney General Knox is "blinded" to the trust law violations throughout the country.

MORE FOOD FOR EXPERIMENTS.

With the results obtained by the government chemists in the examination of various kinds of preserved foodstuffs offered in the market the reading public is fairly familiar. It is known that a large number of such products are treated with chemical preparations either for the purpose of preserving them or for giving them an attractive appearance. Some of the chemicals used are known to be injurious to the consumer. Some are known to be harmless. The effects of others are in doubt, and in order to avoid giving them a name which in itself would imply that they are injurious it has become the custom to refer to them as "sophisticated foods." Concerning them there has been a long controversy, and to bring it to a conclusion experiments under the direction of Dr. Wiley are now to be undertaken at Washington.

• • •

For the purpose of giving the foods a thorough test it is desired to try them upon human beings as well as upon animals. An effort is being made to get a number of young men to submit themselves to the tests. The plan is to get the subject in a good normal condition by the use of proper food, and then give him a food containing one of the disputed preservatives, such as boric acid, for instance, and note the effect. Every chemical preservative or coloring material whose effects are now disputed will thus be put through a thorough test, and it will then be possible for the government officials to report positively whether its use should be permitted.

• • •

In commenting upon the work about to be undertaken Dr. Wiley is reported to have said: "Heretofore, unfortunately, most of the investigation which has been undertaken in this direction has been at the instance of the manufacturer or other interested parties, so that the natural bias peculiar to the human mind has had to be taken into consideration in accepting the result. Through the liberality of congress chemistry has for the first time been enabled to take up the study of this subject in a thorough and systematic manner, and will be enabled to supplement the investigations which have heretofore been made upon the subject of food adulteration. The results which will finally be obtained will be useful to our lawmakers, who will be able to form the statutes so as to secure the necessary precautions in the preservation of foods, while at the same time they will exclude positively injurious substances."

• • •

Experimenting upon human beings is as a rule a risky business, but in this case there seems no reason to fear any serious results to the subjects. The foods they are to try are such as are sold every day in the open market, and no food whose adulterations or sophistications are known to be injurious will be given them. When the results are made known the discussion of pure food regulation will be much clearer than it is now. Moreover, the publication of the results will itself be about as effective as a statute. When once the public is made aware that certain food articles are preserved or colored with dangerous chemicals the demand for those articles will cease to be sufficient to render their manufacture profitable.—San Francisco Call.
