PROCEEDINGS OF THE COUNTY TEACHERS' INSTITUTE

Dr. Wise of Portland, Lectures to a Large Audience on "Shakespeare the Great Moral Teacher."

Dr. Stephen A. Wise's lecture before the teachers' institute at the court house last evening was one of the most interesting events in the history of educational circles in Umatilla county.

Notwithstanding the fact that a popular show was on at the opera house, the court room was crowded, there being more than 600 persons present.

Splendid Musical Program.

Besides the lecture a splendid musical program was rendered. Professor Nowlin called the meeting to order at 9 o'clock and introduced Miss Cozy Raley, as "Pendleton's most talented musician," and she was fully up to the standard designated. She played the "Norwegian Wedding Procession," which was pronounced a rare treat by the audience.

Mrs. J. Borie, introduced as "Eastern Oregon's Sweetest Singer" so delighted the audience that she was required to respond with an encore, and this too, while suffering with a severe cold.

At the close of the lecture, Mrs. Marston, who was introduced as "Pendleton's popular music teacher" sang a very appropriate solo.

Dr. Wise's subject, as announced yesterday, was "Shakespeare as a Moral Teacher." In introducing the distinguished gentleman, Professor Nowlin stated that he was one of the foremost men in the Northwest, both in scholarly attainments, and liberal thought, and before he had finished his address the audience fully agreed with the county superintendent.

Dr. Wise's Address.

Following is the substance of the address:

In his forward to the "Ruling Passions," Henry Van Dyke offers up a prayer of much beauty, praying with the words: "Lord let me never tag a moral to a story, nor tell a story without a meaning." Of him the reading, the study, the love of whom has been a ruling passion with the English-speaking race and other races for 300 years, it may truly be said that though he may not have prayed in these words, nor prayed at all, to any man was ever given such fulfillment of the spirit of this prayer as to William Shakespeare.

I might search far and wide, ponder long without coming upon a sentence which so marvelously recalls the secret of Shakespeare's perfect art and almost perfect achievement. He never tagged a moral to a story nor told a story without a meaning.

The story is the moral, and he who finds no meaning in a Shakespearean tale, sees not, though he have eyes. Thousand-souled, Myriad-sided has Shakespeare been called, and yet to me he is greatest, not as a poet, not as a dramatist—as a moral teacher. The soul of Shakespeare is in his moral teaching.

Shakespeare, more than any other purely literary figure, measures up to Carlyle's "Vates-Prophet" of life, the man who "has seized that sacred mystery rather on a moral side, as good and evil, duty and prohibition."

Shakespeare is a moral teacher, as life itself is a moral teacher, and only in the way in which life may be said to be, using no text save the lives of men, deducting no morals, save the visible and necessary consequences of acts, good and evil, unconscious, but none the less, perhaps the more, real and effective. Shakespeare teaches like nature, noiselessly and silently, proclaiming no laws of moral being, but leading us to see that as nature is governed by laws to which man must conform, so is human life conditioned by moral laws, which are binding upon him, even if they had not been proclaimed in heaven, or announced upon earth.

A copy of the law of gravitation is not given to every new-born dweller on earth for his daily guidance, though it be inviolable. None has brought home to man more clearly than Shakespeare that the moral law, too, is inviolable, rooted as deep and as strong, as the physical laws of the universe. And still we must take exception to the question of Emerson, "What point of moral, of manners, or of the conduct of life has he not settled?" We hold that the genius of Shakespeare justifies this standard, respecting him. What point of moral has he not suggested? Here he is true to nature. He presents to us life's moral problems, though he does not simultaneously give us the solution which we must dig out, not dream, achieve, not guess, for ourselves. Life is not unlike the sphinx in demanding the sacrifice of life from him who fails to come upon the key to the riddle—of the universe. Dowden, one of the most illuminating of Shakespearean critics, has put this thought very simply: "Shakespeare will present life as it is. If life proposes unexplicable riddles, Shakespeare's art must propose them also."

Inexplicable riddles! Is life made up of these? Let us take a nearer view of two of the tragedies of Shakespeare and learn that he was great and towering, for as much as the light of his genius pierced through the darkness of some of the unfathomable mysteries of life, so that much became inexplicable to him.

Lear and Macbeth, it is true, bear out the words of Lowell, "His business was with men, as they were, not as they ought to be." But it is none the less true that this man of vision "who saw life steadily and saw it whole," seeing man as he is, the naked moral being as he is, has helped us to see man as he ought to be, and as he ought not to be.

Lear is a study in gratitude, the vice of black ingratitude to which monster, Shakespeare, in words of Victor Hugo, "Gives two heads, Goneril and Regan." So terrible is this sin, so utterly unspeakable is its manifestation, that words cannot convey the hideous and loathsome quality. The turmoil and discord of the elements are needed to convey the horror, the affrighted storm, the pitiless rain, the crash of the elements, all in fitting accompaniment to the moral clash and ruin which Goneril and Regan have brought upon the world; nothing can be worse.

The universe is topsy-turvy, for its moral foundation has been assailed. The world must go to pieces, for love and reverence and gratitude have been dethroned and trampled upon, and enthroned is the devil with all the cohorts of hell. The earth quakes and things are shaken to their very core, for love, which is the sanction and support of life, has been annihilated and reviled.

Nothing can be more tragic than the tragedy of Lear, and still there is that which lifts up the tragic into the region of the sublime, into the realm of the divine.

It is the saintliness of Cordelia, which throughout opposes the claims of goodness and light and power of darkness and evil. Even if the love of the sweet Cordelia did not, as it in truth does, touch with sunlight the benediction, the blighted life of her father, it would still be true that

THE BRAND DEFEATED.

Thought it Was His Own Calf When it Was First Branded.

Lester Blackburn came to Pendleton today on request of District Attorney Hailey from his home in the Potts country. Blackburn is the young man accused of defacing the brand on cattle belonging to others a few weeks ago and of which considerable has been said. Those who know the young man are familiar with the circumstances of the case and tell the following facts:

Last spring the young man's father bought several head of steers and gave them to him in the valley. They were driven into the Potts country to range and it seems that a calf belonging to a neighbor got into the band and was branded with young Blackburn's brand. A few weeks ago he was out rounding up his cattle and came across the calf. A neighbor was with him, who told Blackburn that the calf was not his. Blackburn said if this was the case the branding was done through mistake and he thought it was his and that the owner could have the calf. His friends then told him that he would have to deface his own brand or he might get himself into trouble, so the calf was caught and the brand defaced so Blackburn's brand was not noticeable. This was what caused the talk of defacing brands, but it is asserted by the neighbors of Blackburn, one of whom is County Commissioner Gilliland, and is in town today, that he would not attempt to defraud any man out of anything, let alone a calf. No charges were brought against Blackburn, as the district attorney is inclined to believe that the whole affair was a mistake. It will be further investigated, however, but the indications are that it will be dropped.
