THE BIG REDWOODS

WHAT FORESTRY CAN DO FOR THEM.

Lumbermen Own the Best of Them
But the Young Trees May be Saved and Grown With Profit—No Danger of Extinction.

What is to be done for the redwoods of the Pacific Coast is a question that has not only agitated California but is of sentimental concern to the whole nation. The bureau of forestry, attacking the problem in a thoroughly practical spirit, has worked out conclusions that should appeal as reasonable at once to the lumbermen, who cut redwood on account of its commercial value, and to those who wish this ancient and marvelous type of tree growth preserved.

The results of this study are given in "The Redwood," bulletin 38 of this bureau, by R. T. Fisher, recently issued by the department.

The Redwood forests are, in point of merchantable yield, probably the densest on earth, many stands yielding 150,000 board feet to the acre; and redwood logging represents the highest development of the lumbering business that has ever been attained on the Pacific Coast. The total supply of redwood is estimated to be 75 billion feet. The amount cut in 1900 was 360 million feet, with a value of $3,645,608. Although only one-tenth of the forests of the United States is owned by lumbermen according to the last census, one-fifth of the redwood is in their hands, and the stands they own are the handsomest and most valuable in the redwood belt.

Ever since the Spaniards began to cut redwood along San Francisco bay, the range of its growth has been diminishing; it now occupies an area of about 2,000 square miles. During the last 50 years several hundred thousand acres of timber have been cut over, and the good lands put into cultivation or turned into pasture. As you year by year the redwood forests have dwindled, it has come to be pretty generally believed that the tree is doomed to extinction.

This popular idea that the redwood has no chance of survival is not well founded. The studies of the bureau of forestry have proved that possibilities of a new growth of redwood after the old trees have been removed are excellent. Given half a chance, the redwood reproduces itself by sprouts with astonishing vigor. Measurements taken by the bureau on cut-over land show that in 30 years, in a fair soil and a dense stand, trees will be grown 16 inches in diameter, 80 feet high, yielding 2000 feet board measure to the acre.

With the knowledge that the redwood as a type need not become extinct, it is possible to consider the impending fate of the giant redwoods in the old forests with a more cheerful mind. Occasional parks and recreation grounds, such as the Big Basin Redwood Park of the Santa Cruz mountains, may preserve small areas of virgin redwood lands; but the richest, the densest, the most beautiful of the forests are owned by lumbermen, and will inevitably be cut. The trees represent capital invested; they are merchantable and will yield a profit now small as it is. Besides, in the virgin stands most of them are just maturity, and the growth put on is inconsiderable. Every consideration then, induces the redwood lumbermen, reasoning from his standpoint, to cut his trees.

Realizing that the fate of the old trees can not be stayed, the bureau of forestry, instead of wasting itself in attempts to check the cutting, confined itself to proving that it is worth while to the lumbermen to do less damage to the young trees in logging virgin redwood lands, and to hold such lands for a second crop. The study made concerns itself with young second growth, rather than with mature trees; with timbered areas rather than with the virgin forest. Where attention is given the old forests and methods of lumbering, it was only that a better knowledge might be gained of second growth and how to deal with it.

The bureau's is the first systematic study of the redwood ever undertaken by a forester, and it has made clear several points about the life and habits of the tree that are little known.
