If ever in the west there was a day so productive of chills and dampened enthusiasm as yesterday, it never before blotted out from the sight of shivering fans, a shifting diamond dotted here and there with half frozen players. The weather was a frost, the wind was a hurricane and the ball was consequently poor and slow. Walla Walla sent down a trainload of heriboned rooters to carry back the honor of victory and they did their best to keep warm by voice and gesture.

When the teams trotted out into the wind and the range of public vision, Collier undertook to throw the sphere over the plate for the home team, but had a hard time of it. The wind was bad and his arm seemed loose somewhere. For several innings his work was ragged, but he pulled himself together at last and played a steady, consistent game. Berry pitched for Walla Walla, or at least bade a desperate effort in that direction until the last half of the fifth, when McGucken toed the rubber and proceeded to hit a few of the boys. The pitching on both sides was poor, but it was not all the fault of the pitcher lads. No man can pitch good ball in a dust storm and a gale. Walla Walla scored twice in the second inning and the red ribbons in the grand stand yelled themselves hoarse. Again in the third the boys in the red suits crossed the plate in front of Brown a couple of times and the score stood high for Walla Walla.

In the second half of the third Neagle batted himself into the first sack. Brown sent him on to second, and then Gass did the trick. With a hot one that the umpire had to dodge and that the second and short made vain leaps to reach, he brought the lefty in for Pendleton's initial mark. After that Walla Walla lost her grip and in the fourth gave the Indians three trips around the circle, thus tying the score.

Walla Walla took a brace and made three more scores at scattered intervals, much to the dismay of the local fans, but in the last half of the eighth the Indian lads raced around the diamond for four runs and won the game. The score stood 8 to 7 in favor of Pendleton.

When the second game was called most of the crowd had frozen out and the interest had ebbed away, borne on the wings of the dust-laden wind. Bruyette opened up the mill with a high one which Spidel, Dunn and Davis court watched silently in its flight. They wanted to see it bounce, and it did. The players seemed tired and so did the audience.

In the last half of the first Brown scored on a mix-up in the field, and then in the first half of the second Irby scored on a wild pitch by McDonald. Then things went all to Walla Walla, even the umpire leaned that way. May be the wind blew him, may be he had dust in his eyes.

In the third inning Walla Walla scored on McDonald's error, and then again on the umpire's decision. After that they scored any old way until the score stood 6 to 1 in Walla Walla's favor and the agony was over.
