JAPAN AND THE WAR CORRESPONDENTS

The Japanese government is embarrassed. Not by the Russians, for they are ready for them, and not by the war, for it has been prepared for that for years.

The point which embarrasses the government, and particularly the war office, is what to do with the war correspondents.

It is the general opinion among the experts that the Japanese-Russian war is going to be the longest and the hardest since the Franco-Prussian war.

As a result of this belief, the war correspondents of the whole world have gathered in Tokio and are besieging the war office for permission to go to the front at once. The permission has not yet been granted, but it is expected that it will be within a few days.

"We thought we had figured on every detail that could possibly affect us after war was declared," said a high government official, laughing, to me the other day, "but we figured without the correspondents. Of course, we expected a few, but we did not, by any means, expect the number that have come. Really we don't know what to do with them."

The government is not at all adverse to having the correspondents with its armies, but the problem of transporting them and getting European food for them into the field is quite a serious one.

And again, the government is anxious to so regulate the correspondents and their work that the country will not suffer from sensational stories that may be sent out. They had a severe lesson in the Chinese war, when certain correspondents sent out lurid stories of brutalities and atrocities entirely unfounded in fact.

It is probable that a more famous or more representative lot of war correspondents was never gathered together than those in Tokio today. There are more than 40 of them, and they represent the greatest paper and news associations in the world.

Many of them are military and navy experts, and among them are names which are known throughout the world.

A large percentage of these correspondents are Englishmen. The dean of all the lot is Melton Prior, the famous war artist of the London Illustrated News. He has been a war artist for more than thirty years, and this will be his eighteenth war. Mr. Prior is very popular among his conferees, has scores of great generals for his personal friends, and is one of the best known men who ever followed an army in the field.

At the head of the war staff of the London Times is Capt. Lionel James, perhaps the foremost military expert of England and a man who covered himself with glory in South Africa.

The chief of the field staff of the London Standard is Maxwell, another correspondent of note, who has a half score of important campaigns to his credit. The London Post is represented by Capt. Knight, who left an arm in South Africa, and at the head of the London Telegraph staff is MacHugh who has seen fighting of all sorts in every corner of Africa.

The London Express is represented by one of the brightest of the younger correspondents, Percival Phillips, an American newspaper man who has scored a big success in London. Collins of Reuters and Capt. Curtin of the Central News are representatives of the big English news agencies. Nearly every one of these men have two or three assistants, who, together with the correspondents stationed at Nagasaki, headed by Bennet Burleigh, make a small army by themselves.

Among the American correspondents perhaps the best known is Oscar King Davis of the New York Herald. He is closely followed by John F. Bass, who did excellent work in the Greco-Turkish war and in the Philippines.

Frederick Palmer, whose articles on the wars in China, the Philippines and Cuba are known to all magazine readers, and R. H. Little, Chicago's contribution to the top-notch crowd.

Among the score of other American correspondents are Martin Eagan, Jack London, J. F. J. Archibald, who is in Hongkong, and James H. Hare, the famous war photographer.

The German contingent is headed by Otto Von Gotthberg, of the Lokal Anzeiger of Berlin, one of the best known correspondents in the world.

If it is of correspondents ever reaches the front, newspaper readers may be assured that they will have no difficulty in finding out everything that occurs and it will be handled as only the best men can handle it.

Contest in Seventh Ohio. Springfield, O., March 17.—A lively contest for the republican congressional nomination is on before the Seventh district convention in session here this afternoon. Congressman Thomas Kyle is a candidate for renomination and is opposed by General J. Warren Kelfer of this city. Prior to the assembling of the convention the Kelfer forces claimed to have enough votes to insure the nomination of their leader, while the Kyle supporters were likewise preparing for a fight to the finish.
