HOBOS SHUN PENDLETON.

Special Officer Makes This City an Unfavorable Field for Tramps.

The hobo is coming to have a terror of the city of Pendleton and is shunning the town with the same perseverance that he is supposed to have in avoiding soap.

The gentry are labelling the cars along the road to the east and west at Baker City and La Grande on the one side and at Umatilla and The Dalles on the other warning the traveling tourists to avoid the Pendleton yards.

This state of affairs is largely due to the efforts of special officer Shephard who has made his presence felt in this part of the country. He has a vendetta with the tramp for it was one of the tribe who robbed him of a lot of clothes and other personal property some time ago. Since that time he has acted as a special officer and has cleared up the yards in good shape.

One man has been in the city for a couple of days claiming to be lame. He travels on crutches when he is being watched, but when he thinks he is out of sight he is as spry as any of them and his limp disappears. He was invited to take a ride on the first outgoing freight and is perhaps by this time in some other city.

ALASKAN TIMBER

NATIVE SUPPLY CONSISTS OF SITKA SPRUCE.

Alutian Islands Are Not Timbered—Climate Mild and Rainfall Abundant—Several Sawmills Are Now Operated in the Territory—Timber Line Reaches to 3,000 Feet Above Sea Level.

Henry Gannet, the chief geographer of the United States geological survey, referring to the forests of Alaska, says the coast as far westward as Cook's Inlet, is densely forested to the timber line, which ranges with the latitude from 2,000 to 3,000 feet above the sea level.

It consists almost entirely of Sitka spruce, which is "large and fine as judged by Eastern standards, but as compared with the timber of Oregon and Washington, which is the standard on the Pacific coast, it is inferior."

Little use is now made of it, as most of the timber that is needed in Alaska is shipped there from Puget Sound ports. However, several sawmills have been established at various points on the Alaskan coast of late years and lumbering is becoming one of the stable industries.

One of the peculiarities of the Alaskan forest belt is that it goes no farther west on the Alaskan peninsula than Kadiak. On the Alutian islands there are no trees growing; still the climate is mild and the rainfall abundant. No satisfactory reason has yet been assigned for the abrupt termination of the forested belt at that point.

The northern and west coast of the territory, north of the Alutian archipelago, is destitute of timber. In the interior there are vast areas of spruce, which, it is reasonably supposed, will some time be of great commercial value to the territory.

A positive knowledge of the area and value for commercial uses of these forests, which we are now to obtain through the survey instituted by the government will, however, be invaluable for the future guidance of the lumberman and others.
