These lambs were all grade Oxford, Cotswolds and Shropshires, and uncommonly large and rangy animals, and were not culled closely. This sale is said to justify the opinion of the value of breeding "course" sheep for the mutton market.

NEEDS ADVERTISING.

Dense Ignorance in the East About Coming Exposition.

Prof. Bleakney recalls that upon his recent trip in the East, he encountered the densest ignorance concerning the Lewis and Clark exposition. In fact, each of the Mississippi the person who knows anything at all about it is the exception. Scores of intelligent and otherwise well informed people in every walk of life would reply to inquiries intended to test their information upon the subject, "Don't know." "Really never heard of it." "When will it take place?" and so on.

Naturally, Mr. Bleakney is impressed with the imperative need of advertising the exposition, and is profoundly convinced that unless there is a liberal appropriation for publicity wisely expended, that the attendance from those very states which Oregon wishes most to appeal to and expects most from in the way of immigration and invested capital will be the most insignificant.

IGNORANCE OF OREGON.

Surprising Letters Received at the Office of the Oregon Information Bureau.

Secretary Birrell, of the Oregon Information Bureau, at the Union depot building, Portland, has some of the most wonderful curiosities in the form of letters that possibly ever passed through the United States mail.

An Indianian, writing to the bureau for information concerning Oregon and its resources recently, asked if it were true, as reported, that it rains so much in the vicinity of Portland that the farmers place wide boards on the feet of their horses to prevent them from sinking into the mud.

Another anxious inquirer asked to be told exactly in what portion of California, Oregon was situated. Others inquire about the kind of houses built on the farms, and the dangers from savages in the interior of the state. It all magnifies the fact that Oregon needs advertising.
