GENERAL NEWS.

A petition containing the names of 175,000 "responsible" men and women of Pennsylvania, has gone to the governor urging the pardon of Mrs. Edwards, who murdered her brutal husband.

The Kentucky Wesleyan College, the official school of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, burned at Winchester, Ky., causing a loss of about $75,000.

Howard Brown and Jack Sparks, cowboys, fought at a ranch on Powder river, Wyoming. Sparks used a gun as a club, but was probably fatally stabbed by Brown, who was little injured.

Three aeronauts ascended from the Crystal Palace, London, and descended at St. Denis, near Paris. The trip was made at a speed of 70 miles per hour in an ordinary balloon, not a "flying machine."

Statistics compiled by the department of commerce and labor show that with the exception of Denver and Los Angeles the city of Washington has the largest proportion of deaths occur from consumption.

At Spring Valley, Wyoming, a circular saw flew off its axle and on its way over into the next county, shaved the ear of Thomas Bradshaw, who was standing about 40 feet from the mill. Bradshaw was not otherwise hurt.

Although he was one of the most famous mechanical engineers in the West, and his specialty the manufacture of steam engines, Raymond E. Plank was killed at Denver by the explosion of so simple a mechanism as the water front of his coal range, which he was trying to thaw out.

Alexander Ferguson, the oldest man in Indiana, and possibly in the United States, lies dead in his log cabin home near the town of Gilman, Ind., having died at the age of 120 years. Church records in Ireland and a marriage license issued to Ferguson, when 30 years of age, prove his age.

NORTHWEST NEWS.

The office of state printer in Washington, abolished in 1899, will probably be re-established by the present legislature.

John Gleason, a musician, was shot and killed in a saloon row in Seattle, by William Kirkland, a bartender, who claimed that Gleason attempted to stab him.

S. Vick, a workman in the Bremerton navy yard, fell 40 feet off a scaffolding and was badly mangled up. He was taken to the hospital, where he is expected to die.

The Washington legislature is loaded down with useless appendages in the way of clerks, but entirely lacks the nerve to get rid of them. The senate alone has 55 clerks.

Second Lieutenant P. H. McDonald, of the 10th U. S. infantry, has been sentenced from Fort Lawton to two years in the penitentiary for forgery and obtaining money by other false pretenses. Wine, women and cards.

Ellis Soule, assistant city attorney of Spokane, died suddenly. His father, living at Plainwell, Mich., died suddenly of congestion of the brain, when he received the news of his son's death. There will be a double funeral at Plainwell.

The Lewiston gas plant is nearly completed. It is said its capacity is for a town of 50,000 inhabitants. The exemplification of faith is discerned in the fact that nobody in Lewiston thinks the above figure is extravagant. Nobody outside of Lewiston but believes it is.

160 acres on Unatilla river; 100 acres on flat, subject to irrigation. Good soil; would make fine alfalfa ranch. Fair improvements; farm implements and 50 cords of wood go with the place; four miles from Pendleton. $4,500.

ILLAD OF PORTLAND

PROSE ILLAD OF THE ROSE
CITY BY C. E. McLELLAN.

A City of Beauty and Business, of Haste and Picturesqueness—New Light Thrown on the Place by a Trained Observer—A Synopsis of the Development of Sixty Years, and Description of the Present City.

Portland, Feb. 12.—"Here Occident and Orient each other greet, at ocean's brink, where sail and sail do meet."

"Business and sentiment are strangers," somebody has said. Well, perhaps, but there is the Bulletin, the official organ of that eminently business institution, the Portland Chamber of Commerce, actually dropping into poetry. Of course, it is only two lines, with a picture of Portland's skyscrapers and Mount Hood in the background, sandwiched away among a lot of advertisements; but a distinct acknowledgement of the debt of business to the muses, nevertheless.

The poetical effusion is followed by a column and a half of descriptive information about Portland for the benefit of the stranger within her gates.

Portland is built on the Willamette river at the head of deep water navigation on that stream. About a dozen sea-going vessels are here at present loading lumber and other products for various parts of the world.

Both sides of the river are lined with wharves, warehouses, manufacturing plants with grimy smokestacks, all the appurtenances which this city's growing commerce has called into being, somewhat marred for a short distance the beauty of the river, which been an inspiration to Oregon literature. But on the other hand, these warehouses, each with its white winged messenger of commerce loading or unloading at its wharf, are so many evidences of the wealth and commercial importance in the world of this city and the country tributary to it.

First House in 1842.

The first house on the present sight of the city of Portland was built in 1842, and the city laid out in 1845. It seems a far cry from that solitary log structure of 60 years ago to the city of today, stretching along both sides of this stream and reaching out into the country beyond, and in the light of past developments it does not require a very prophetic vision to see another far cry to the Portland of 60 years hence.

The New York World of recent date, commenting on the uptown march of that city, says: "From the roof of a two million dollar hotel, rising from a two million dollar site in Battery place, guests of the early future are to have the privilege, while they dine, of gazing across the bay and down through the Narrows at the fairest water prospect round about New York. The new hotel will rise a long quarter of a mile from where, opposite Bowling Green, the serene knickerbockers of a day far away sat in the garden of Kreiger's tavern and saw the sun sink behind the trees."

It may be some time in the future before it will be found necessary to build a two million dollar hotel on top of Portland Heights to gain a glimpse of Mt. Hood over the intervening skyscrapers, but the uptown movement has begun. Here are churches and theaters near neighbors at 12th and 14th streets, and here is a lot 50x100 feet on 14th street, on which a brick business block is to be erected, sold yesterday for $24,500. This is only one of the many signs of the uptown progress which is noted.

At the city hall, a splendid structure erected at a cost, including the site, of $675,000, is found the museum where the visitor can spend some of his spare time very profitably. Here, too, is the home of the Oregon Historical society, in whose rooms a collection of interesting relics and curiosities are found, from which much information of the early history of the state and also its progress and resources, as one of the important commonwealths of the nation, can be learned.

First Newspaper in 1850.

For instance, here, hanging on the wall, is a framed copy of the first newspaper published in the state—a little 4-page, 6-column weekly, published in 1850. Looking through the window, the present home of the same newspaper can be seen, towering high among its business neighbors, showing clearly that in the march of progress the art of building a great newspaper has not lagged by the wayside.

A few years ago a ferry boat was found sufficient for the demands of traffic between the two sides of the river. The ferry is still in operation, apparently doing a good business. In addition, there are now four bridges across the stream, and still there is much complaint of impeded traffic.

While the west side of the river has all the wholesale establishments and, in fact, nearly all the business, the east side now claims half the city's population, and the residence district on that side is building up rapidly, probably because property is much cheaper, and also a little nearer Mt. Hood.

Of course, all these people who live on the east side and do business, or work on the west side, have to cross these bridges several times a day.

To reach St. Johns, Vancouver, Oregon City, or in fact, almost any of the points reached by the Portland street railway, the river has to be crossed, and as a consequence, life on the bridges at times becomes quite animated, not to say strenuous. A drayman loads up his team to the last pound it can pull, and gets hung up on the draw. Behind him promptly lines up a miscellaneous collection of drays, express wagons, streets cars loaded with business men with engagements in philanthropic work downtown, then a steamboat comes along and whistles for an open draw. Of course the draw don't open, and a volume of profanity arises which is truly eloquent.

WHOLESALE CATTLE STEALING.

Montana Cursed With a Revival of Range Rustling.

The attention of stockmen has of late been especially directed to the large number of lost cattle reported throughout Carbon county. It is stated that there is hardly an owner of any considerable amount of stock that has not suffered to some extent. Some report ten to a dozen head missing; others state that there are as many as 20 or 30 missing from their herds, says a Montana paper.

The Picket is informed that A. P. McDonald of Bridger has been keeping track recently of reports of this character that have come under his notice and that he has compiled a list of 300 missing cattle. It is also stated that last year there were at least 1500 head that could not be accounted for.

There is a belief prevalent in the minds of many that systematic cattle stealing operations are going on and that stock is being driven out of the county on the quiet, some of it going northward and some southward.

The plan is being agitated for the stockmen to get together on this proposition and adopt some method of meeting this drain on the cattle industry and also to devise some plan for locating missing stock. It is suggested that lists be prepared with brands and owners names and that these be sent to different localities as far as Canada and southward through Wyoming and into the Hole-in-the-Wall country. In this manner it is believed that much can be accomplished.

No definite arrangements have yet been made, but it is probable that some action will speedily be taken.
