CLIMBED IN 1845

FIRST RECORDED ASCENT OF MOUNT HOOD BY WHITES.

A The Dalles-Lady Furnishes a Most Entertaining Account of the Early Ascents of Mounts Hood, Adams and Jefferson, Contributing Much to the Early History of Mountain Travel and Adventure in Oregon.

As this is the season of snow mountain climbing, a few incidents concerning the early ascents of the snow-capped sentinels of the Cascade range may not be amiss at this time. Through the kindness of Mrs. C. J. Crandall The Dalles Chronicle obtained the following facts:

The first ascent of any snow mountain of the Cascades made by whites, was by a party from The Dalles in 1845. H. B. Brewer, one of the missionaries at the Methodist mission at The Dalles, accompanied by a young Indian guide, made the ascent of Mt. Adams, on the 16th day of September of that year.

Mr. Brewer's journal of the ascent, is preserved in a little book for a Sunday school story of mission work in Oregon, and so far as known is the only record of this early ascent. From The Dalles Mr. Brewer was accompanied by two Indian boys. They swam their horses across the Columbia river, they themselves being ferried across in a canoe by Indians. They followed the Indian trails along the side of mountains, across streams and through almost impassable timber, to the "Indian berry ground" near Mt. Adams, when they made a camp. On the 16th, at early day, Mr. Brewer, with two Indian guides, one a young man, the other an old Klickitat Indian, started for the mountain, which loomed just before them but seemed only a short distance away. They were until 11 o'clock traveling 12 miles, and were then only at the foot of the mountain, from which to the snow-line was a heavy growth of timber—fir and spruce. At the snow-line they left their horses and climbed afoot, the old Klickitat leading.

When well up the mountain the old man gave out, and giving some directions, he returned to the horses, leaving Mr. Brewer and the young Indian to pick their way long the rocky ridges alone. The moss-flower was in full bloom, and tracks of deer and elk frequently crossed their path. When within a thousand feet of the summit, Mr. Brewer could go no further as he was exhausted, and the sun going down.

The hills of the Willamette 150 miles away, and the Columbia river at Ft. Vancouver, 100 miles away, were visible to the naked eye. The lateness of the hour and the chilliness of evening warned them that they commence the descent without further delay. They arrived at the snow-line where they left their horses at 10 o'clock p. m., too late to proceed further, and there they spent the night with no protection from the elements and hard ground, than the clothing they had on. The next day they returned to the "berry ground," having fasted, with the exception of a few berries, for 20 hours. The old Klickitat Indian told Mr. Brewer that he was the first white man to climb Mt. Adams.

Mr. Brewer also speaks of an eruption of Mt. St. Helens during November of 1842. A dark cloud shrouded the sky, and something like sand descended gently to the earth covering everything in color like ashes, its odor like sulphur. To investigate the source of this strange phenomena they crossed the Klickitat river and ascended one of the Klickitat hills, where they could see Mt. St. Helens throwing out a dark cloud of smoke from what seemed to be smothered fires.

The Oregonian sent the first party up Mt. Hood in August, 1854, when Mr. Dwyer, founder of that paper, with Major Haller of the Fourth United States infantry, then stationed at Fort Dalles, and Nathan Olney, a prominent citizen of old Wasco, made the ascent, probably from this side of the mountain. Mr. Dwyer had ascended Mt. St. Helens the summer previous and ascertained the fact that Mt. Hood and Mt. St. Helens were exhaling volcanoes and still emitted smoke and ashes from vents near the summits. Evidently one of the gentlemen who climbed Mt. Hood this season, found one of these vents, as he was almost asphyxiated by the poisonous gases emitted.

The first ascent of Mt. Jefferson was made by prospectors in July, 1854. Gen. Hazard Stevens, son of Washington territory's first governor, I. T. Stevens, who climbs Mt. Rainier this week, claims the honor of making the first ascent in August, 1870. In company with P. B. Van Trump, he climbed the mountain and was compelled to remain all night on the peak with no other protection from the intense cold of the night than the jets of steam emitting from one of the craters.

The Indian name of Mt. Hood is "Wiyeast;" that of Mt. St. Helens, "Loo-wit-let-kia;" of Mt. Adams, "Klickitat;" of Mt. Rainier, "Tak-ho-ma."

With 5000 Pink Lights.
The Count and Countess Boni de Castellane have thrown open the magnificent salons of their Bois de Boulogne residence, which has only just been completed, to a large reception for Paris aristocracy. The floral decorations consisted of garlands of roses and for-get-me-nots, heliotrope and other old-fashioned flowers fastened to the walls by Pompadour bows of palest blue velvet. Similar garlands were hung from the superb chandeliers to the cornice. The electric lights, not one of which was larger than a walnut, were hidden in the petals of pink crystal globes fashioned in the shape of La France rosebuds. In the music room alone there were 5000 of these lights. The countless wren of Venetian silk of interwoven rose, blue,
