STATE LIBRARIES

THREE METHODS OF PROVIDING PUBLIC AID

Miss Caroline Marvin, Secretary of the Minnesota Library Commission, today called the attention of local librarians to the possibilities of creating units in which a limited number of books may be loaned on easy terms. She said these units could be started at a small cost and would be of great value to the community.

To inaugurate the scheme, Miss Marvin has established a small library in the town of St. Paul. This library consists of a few hundred volumes and is open to the public during hours when the public library is closed. It is managed by a volunteer committee and is supported by contributions from the community.

The scheme is designed to provide temporary libraries for rural communities where a full-time librarian is not available. It is hoped that the success of the St. Paul library will encourage the establishment of similar units in other parts of the state.

A new method of providing public aid is being launched in the state, with the aim of making educational materials more accessible to the people.

Miss Marvin's scheme is but one of the three methods of providing public aid that have been devised in recent years. The others are:

1. The Minnesota Library Commission, which has been established to provide a central library for the state. It is supported by the state government and is responsible for the distribution of books to rural communities.

2. The Minnesota State Library, which acts as a clearing house for educational materials. It provides a directory of libraries and other sources of information, and offers advice to librarians and educators.

The new method of providing public aid is expected to be particularly useful in rural areas where a full-time librarian is not available. It is hoped that the scheme will be adopted in other parts of the state, and that it will serve as a model for other states to follow.
