INDIAN PONY ROUNDUP.

Over 20,000 Head to be Gathered by Colville Indians.

The annual spring roundup of Indian ponies has begun on the Colville Indian reservation.

One hundred riders were in the saddle far among the hills and valleys of the great South Half, states one account. It is estimated by some of the riders that there are about 20,000 horses on the southern portion of the reservation, but a much smaller number to the north. The bunchgrass is in evidence earlier in the spring along the hillsides sloping toward the Columbia than it is farther north, and it is here that the horses find their way when the first sign of spring appears.

The riders participating in the roundup are principally Indians, although there are a few white men in the ranks. Most of the whites engaged are those who ran horses on the reservation years ago and who never succeeded in getting all the animals with their brands when they quit the range. It is these stray animals they are after.

A surprising feature in the present roundup is that a very small per cent of the horses are found to have perished during the severe winter. The large amount of snow, the shortage of feed, and the long drawn out cold weather led to a belief that there would be thousands of dead horses on the range this spring. In fact it was estimated at one time that 80 per cent of the horses would die. The present roundup is proving this estimate far from correct, as very few carcasses have been found by the riders.
