HOW TREES REST.

Evergreen Trees are Dormant Through Winter Months.

"What we call evergreens," says a gentleman formerly connected with the park department of St. Louis, "are not really green during the winter, nor are they really alive, but are dormant."

"Every plant must have its period of rest at some time in the year, and in our northern latitudes the winter is, of course, the most appropriate season. The evergreens generally retain a greater part of their foliage during the winter, but a close examination shows that it dies to such an extent as to be really dead, and a large part of it falls off when the plants begin their spring growth. The drying branches and stems become as dry as the foliage, and being almost entirely devoid of moisture, are little damaged by the winter's cold. In some parts of the tropics, however, as in the highlands of southern Mexico and Central America, the summer is the resting time of the trees. The intense heat of the sun dries up the earth, the trees drop their leaves, the woody portions become as dry as our evergreens in winter, the tree takes its rest until the autumn rains begin."

"Of course this rule does not apply to a large number of tropical plants which grow in most jungles or swampy places. They have accustomed themselves to their conditions, but even they still retain the resting habit, and at some time of the year relax in their growing and become as near dormant for a time as circumstances will permit."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Umatilla Supplies Seattle.

Two or three facts which came to the attention of the market reporter of the Republic today will essentially interest the farmers of this valley, says the Yakima Republic. A letter received from Seattle, from a merchant there, said that at the time of writing, Monday, there were on wheels in the railroad yards at Seattle, 40 cars of Idaho potatoes and they were pretty fair stock at that.

About the same time an issue of the Pendleton Oregonian declared that shipments of potatoes are being made from the Athena and Echo sections of the Umatilla portion of Oregon, the total purchase there being something like 36 cars.

The potato market, therefore, is not as safe as it seemed a week ago. J. M. Perry of North Yakima, who was in Seattle last week, said he found a very small proportion of Yakima potatoes there but that the sound markets were well supplied with Idaho, Oregon and western Washington spuds.

There are numerous indications of a considerable consumption there but a sufficiency offering at this time to leave no doubt of the ability of the supply to see the demand through until the new potatoes put in an appearance.
