ROOSEVELT IS QUEER MIXTURE

EDITOR OF CHICAGO POST
ANALYZES PRESIDENT.
Strange Mixture of Patriotism and Democracy Explained—Latest Message Appeals to Thinking Minds—Puzzling Conditions Which Threaten Nation Responsible for Seeming Paradox.

Louis F. Post, editor of the Chicago Public, is a philosophical chemist. His power of analysis is extraordinary, probably unequalled in this country by that of any other man. Taking President Roosevelt's latest message, Mr. Post not only analyzes it, but he gives a satisfactory explanation of the strange mixture of paternalism and democracy that is so puzzling to some of the thinking admirers of the president as well as to his opponents and his enemies.

There is about this latest message, as Mr. Post says, a ring that appeals strongly to minds just beginning to realize the dangers of plutocracy, and appeals even more strongly to persons that have long realized these dangers and have turned for defense to paternalistic measures; "for, if one thing stands out in higher relief than another in Mr. Roosevelt's message, it is its paternalism. And yet a spirit of genuine democracy seems now and then almost to get expression."

To one reading President Roosevelt's speeches and messages carefully, he appears to give free rein to his paternalism, but to curb himself when giving expression to a thoroughly democratic thought, or else to be groping when he speaks as a democrat. That may be because he has saturated himself with Hamiltonianism since he entered public life. Mr. Post's explanation of the Rooseveltian confusion of the paternalistic with the democratic is as follows:

"It is the obscurity in which the modern economic habit of 'capitalizing' all forms of earning power beclouds essential differences that underlie 'capitalization.' A railway plant, for instance, has a certain periodical earning power which 'capitalizes' into a certain price; its right of way also has a certain periodical earning power which likewise 'capitalizes' into a certain price. If one distinct interest owned the right of way and another plant, and the two interests were not interchangeable, there would be no difficulty whatever in distinguishing. The plant would clearly be a labor product, and the right of way a government grant—as clearly as if there were no such thing as 'capitalization.' But when these two essential different forms are 'capitalized' as one, the distinction seems shadowy—a distinction without a difference. The whole thing seems to be 'capital' and its owners 'capitalists.' But the difference is just as substantial and distinguishable when both plant and right of way are interchangeably 'capitalized,' as they would be if there were no such economic phenomena as 'capitalization.' Their essential nature is not altered by the commercial conventionalities. The one is still a labor product, having a title traceable through contracts to the producers; the other is still a government grant, a species of continuous favoritism from the sovereign power.

"It seems to be his failure to detect this essential difference between labor products and government grants, when both are 'capitalized' in one lump on the basis of their earning power, that confuses President Roosevelt. Had he clearly perceived that difference beneath the 'capitalistic' system which makes it, he could have drawn a vital distinction—a distinction so illuminating as to have clarified his whole message. Seeing that governmental grants of power essentially differ from products of labor, even when 'capitalization' begets the difference, he might have avoided the confusion of advocating at once a type of individualism that makes private property of public functions, and a type of socialism that obtrudes public interference into private business."

That is the most reasonable explanation we have seen of the curious mental phenomena exhibited by the president. Apart from the game of politics, it must be believed that he is intellectually honest, that he wishes to be right, and that he believes he is right. His mental confusion is almost precisely that which exists in the mind of the socialist, the chief difference being that he does not draw the socialists' conclusions.
