OREGON WATERS PUZZLE EXPERTS

SOURCE OF FLOW
REMAINS MYSTERY

Expert Geologists Examine Great Springs in Southern Oregon—Cannot Ascertain Where Water Comes From—Northern Valley of Summer Lake Produces Phenomenon.

A bulletin of the government geological survey relative to the investigation of the source of waters investigated in southern Oregon says:

The northern end of the valley of Summer lake, in southern Oregon, contains a group of three or four large springs which unite to form Ana river, the principal feeder of the lake from the south. These springs occur in a semi-arid region, where their volume—approximately 100,000 gallons a minute—and their constant flow through wet and dry seasons make their source of unusual interest, and their source has always been a puzzle to local investigators.

Summer Lake Valley is a depression bordered on the west and north by conspicuous cliffs of basalt and on the east by lower rims of the same material. One large stream, Chewaucan river, rising in the wooded mountains west of the basin, discharges into it through a conspicuous canyon, but the flow of this stream is less than that of the great springs at the head of the valley, and a large part of it escapes over the surface southward through Chewaucan marsh into the alkaline Lake Albert, which occupies a depression somewhat lower than that partially filled by Summer lake. The surface drainage into the basin from the high, rocky arid plateaus to the east is small.

The temperatures of the Ana river waters—29 degrees or more above the mean annual temperature of the region—indicate that the springs rise from depths 1000 feet or more below the surface is probably a mere veneer, whose thickness is much less than this is the alluvium that forms the valley floor, it is probable that the waters rise from the underlying rocks along one or more of the lines of easy passage afforded by the faults or fracture planes that limit the valley. But even if the springs yield rock waters from depths, the source of these waters still remains unknown. The geologists of the United States geological survey, who have been studying the region, rejected at once the idea that the areas east and south of the springs could furnish the waters, partially because of the aridity in these areas, and partly because their investigations had revealed structural conditions that would tend to prevent the circulation of the water westward to the point at which it issues. North and west of the springs, however, is a mountainous region, not well known geographically, but including an area that is well timbered and has relatively high rainfall. In this region rise Sprague and Williamson rivers, both streams of considerable volume. It is probable that the surface of this mountain region presents areas of porous rocks capable of absorbing the rain water that falls upon it, and these areas are regarded as the most probable source of the waters that issue in such great volume at the springs.

A report on the geology and water resources of the lake region of southern Oregon has been prepared for the survey by Mr. Gerald A. Waring, the geologist who did the work, and will be forwarded to the printer during the summer.

THE MOCKING BIRD.

Wing-footed flute! You, who, the legends say,
On that glad morn when earth's melodious throng
Was given, each his own loved lilt of song,
By some strange fate were cheated of your lay,
Our hopes are buoyed because you did not stay
Forever mute, but, solacing your wrong
With carols that to all your kind belong,
You sang, as still you sing, more sweet than they.

So shall brave spirits to your will conform,
Nor to a fault yfortune be resigned.
But with a purpose, resolute and warm,
Mount to the noblest measure of the mind,
As the young eagle fronts the roaring storm
And higher soars to heavens less confined.
