AMUSEMENTS

A "CELL" ON MASON IN "A STUBBORN CINDERELLA"

Homer B. Mason, the star of Mort H. Singer's "A Stubborn Cinderella" Co., is a big, strapping fellow with a humorous twinkle in his eye, and a chap who enjoys a joke even when it is played upon himself as the following will show.

"So you want a story? Well, here's one, that happened to me when I was in vaudeville. I was playing in St. Paul. A friend of mine named Cal Stone framed up a deal that I was to come to a party he was giving at his house that night, rigged up in my regular burglar makeup, and do a piano stunt. Well, I fixed myself up and went to his back door and asked for a bit to eat and told a hard luck story.

"The girl was on and they got me into the parlor where all the guests were seated, and Stone asked me a lot of freak questions and I faked the answers, and finally ended up by doing my piano stunt. Nobody was on but a couple of young girls who had seen me do my turn at the vaudeville theater but they kept mum and I went out of the back door as much a burglar as I was when I came in.

"Well, that fellow Stone, by George, had gone to the Chief of Police, who was a friend of his, and put up a job on me, so when I was walking down the steps to my carriage, a big cop jumped out at me. I wasn't 'on,' you know, and was sure scared to death. I argued with the cop.

"Look at my make-up," says I. "What do I care for your make-up," says the cop. "Don't you know it's against the law to go about the streets in disguise? How do I know you're what you say you are? You come along with me."

"I told him to wait before he made a fool of himself, but he would not listen. I showed him my carriage. That didn't phase him.

"Then I said, 'See here, just come back into the house and my friend Stone will tell you who I am.'

"The cop was agreeable, so we went back. Stone came to the door.

"See here, Stone, this is a new man on the force, I guess, and he wants to run me in. Just tell him who I am and let me go home. I'm freezing to death."

"Stone gave me a glare and said, 'I don't know you. He looks like a crook, officer. You had better take him along.'

"Well, you can imagine how I felt. I cursed the cop, I cursed Stone, I cursed myself, and then cursed everybody in general. To heap it on the cop took me to the station in the carriage I was paying for. The sergeant would not believe me, and had me searched. They found my pistol in my pocket, the one I used in my act. That was evidence against me, they said. The pistol was a fake and would not cut any ice, it was a gun just the same. Then I began to get sore. They gave me permission to telephone Stone, and I told him he had gone far enough.

"I guess he thought so, too, so I was released. That's the nearest I ever came to languishing in a prison cell.
