BARB WIRE FENCE TO BAR OUT MEXICAN TICK

Washington.—A barb wire fence with which to keep out the Mexican cattle tick is the queer expedient for which the Bureau of Animal Industry is trying to secure congressional permission.

The fence needn't be made of a mesh small enough to keep out the insect. But there must be a barrier to keep the tick-infested Mexican cattle off of Uncle Sam's territory. Otherwise the American cattle-grower finds his herds full of the pest.

The Bureau has asked congress to grant an appropriation to do the fencing clear along the international border line wherever natural conditions do not constitute an impassable barrier for cattle.

SUBTERRANEAN PASSAGES OF MEDIAEVAL APPEARANCE

Washington.—When the senate and house office buildings were built and subterranean tubes bored to connect the two structures with the capitol itself a new vista of halls and corridors were opened.

The capitol building has a modern appearance from the ground up, but underneath, in the sub-basement, so to speak, everything is mediaeval. In the good old days when the foundations of the government were built brick work was en règle. Hence underlying the whole building are bewildering stretches of ticked corridors that twist about like a maze. The subways from the house and senate tap a series of these subterranean passage ways at either end of the capitol. Modern architects and workmen have done their best to straighten out their kinks; electric lights point the way to elevators out of the cave-like passages, and dozens of signboards tell the way to wayfarers.
