GEORGE V SLIGHTS U. S.

Will New King Follow Precedent of Other Georges?
 London.—During the reign of King George III, the American colonies achieved their independence after administering a thorough whipping to John Bull.
 When George IV became regent, America again took to arms and proved the supremacy of the new nation on land and sea.
 A century later, while Americans are planning a centennial celebration of the anniversary of the peace pact between the two great Anglo-Saxon nations, another King George has entered upon a program which threatens to strain the friendly relations now existing between America and the motherland.
 King George has shown on several occasions that he dislikes Americans, and Queen Mary is openly and almost rabidly antagonistic to the United States and all that savors of Americanism.
 When Theodore Roosevelt, as special envoy to King Edward's funeral, was given a place in the procession subordinate to the petty Akhond of Swat and the Duke of Dingbat, the feeling of King George was plainly in evidence.
 Now the most high and mighty George is sending envoys to various nations to acquaint them with the fact that Edward VII is dead and that George V, by the grace of God, reigns in Edward's stead. It is rather unimportant and trite proceeding, but it gathers significance from the announcement that the United States is not to be favored with an envoy.
 Servia and Roumania are considered as having sufficient importance to warrant the sending of an envoy, but Uncle Sam, it seems, has not yet reached a stature warranting the notice of England's monarch.
 It is evident that republicanism has nothing to do with George's decision, as France is included in the list of nations to which envoys are accredited.

Play Baseball in Belfast, Belfast, Ireland.—Belfast was treated to a real American game of baseball the other day, the players being a party of exiles from the United States training ship Newport, lying at Carrickfergus. They were entertained at lunch by the lord mayor of the city.
