TEXAS CITY SUBURB CLAIMS GREAT GROWTH

Houston Heights, one of Houston's suburbs, has added 618 persons to her population every year for the last ten years, a growth which has scarcely been equaled in the United States by a similar town so far as is disclosed by the last census reports. Ten years ago Houston Heights had 800 population while today the town is credited with 6984. There are half a dozen communities similar to this and adjoining this city all served by Houston car lines, telephones and public utilities. Their working people work in Houston and their business men have their offices and shops in this city but owing to Houston's restricted boundaries, sixteen square miles, the federal census shows this city with less than 80,000 population. By 1920 it is proposed to have all of these outlying districts included in Houston proper.
