LANE MOONSHINERS CAUGHT AFTER LONG SIEGE BY OFFICERS

TWO MEN OPERATED ELUSIVE STILL, SELLING PRODUCT TO TIMBER WORKERS.

Change From Wholesale to Retail Business Credited as Responsible For Capture—Detectives Long on the Trail.

EUGENE, Ore., July 19.—"For sale—Half interest in good paying moonshiners' still in Lane county."

The change from a wholesale to a retail liquor business and a desire for a partnership expansion is held by the officers to be responsible for the arrest of James Williams and Mark Broom, alleged moonshiners, now in jail. Interesting developments in yesterday's arrests came today.

For five years the two are said to have manufactured their product in the mountains and sold by means of middlemen in the lumber camps of Lane county, in Eugene and to several small saloons about the state. Federal officers have been aware of the still on the McKenzie and several times have made vain efforts to catch its operators. An extensive system is believed to have warned them, and the place in the mountains is said to be almost inaccessible. The manufacture is believed to have been intermittent, depending upon the activity of the federal officers.

The local officers do not believe that the men have been peddling the whiskey themselves until recently, and the new tactics have been to catch the men on a local option case.

Two detectives, employed jointly by J. M. Devers, district attorney, and J. C. Parker, sheriff, are said to have been such good customers that partnership was talked, and in the course of the transaction the property in question was to be visited.

This happened last May. Then the original proprietors scented trouble and the sale was off. The federal officers had two detectives on the river at the same time. They had been there as fishermen. One night they heard the sound of two men crossing the river at night. The next morning they came upon the deserted furnace where the elusive still had been operated.

After this, activity on the part of the officers relaxed to allow suspicion, until last week's events, that read almost like a Kentucky novel, were climaxed Saturday night with the announcement of Sheriff Parker that the men were in jail and that the still, hidden in a pocket of the McKenzie, had been raided that afternoon.

Broom at one time slipped through the grasp of the law. Then came a mysterious message to the sheriff.

"Broom will leave Springfield for the McKenzie at a given time in the morning," it said.

The sheriff left Eugene at 3:15 o'clock in the morning and 20 miles up the river his motorcar overtook that of the fleeing men and both were covered with the officer's revolvers.

WOULD you go into the woods or attempt to sail the seas without a compass?

You would hardly trust to your sense of direction, would you?

Then why let your "pocket-book" sail the uncharted seas?

Why let it run the risks of shoals and rocks?

Why not charter it straight to the harbor of safe, sane and economical buying.
