EYE WITNESS OF BATTLE OF THE MARNE TELLS HOW PARIS WAS SAVED FROM THE TEUTONS

(NOTE—A year ago today the battle that saved Paris came to an end after five days of desperate fighting. It is now known as the battle of the Marne. In the days when the struggle was raging Simms sent a stream of cablegrams telling of developments as they occurred. For the anniversary, he has sent a complete account of the battle as it would have been told Sept. 19, 1914, had it been humanly possible to assemble all the facts and get them past the censor.)

BY WILLIAM PHILLIP SIMMS (United Press Staff Correspondent.)

PARIS, Sept. 19, 1915.—The German army is in full retreat. The allied forces are everywhere victorious. After getting within sight of Paris and when it seemed that nothing on earth could stop their drive, the invaders have been hurled back in disorder and the capital is safe.

With a recklessness bordering on impudence, the result of seeing fortress after fortress surrender merely before the menace of their approach, the Prussians ignored the reserves they must have known were massed here, turned eastward from Paris expecting to crush a weak and routed enemy. In so doing they uncovered their right and General Maunoury struck. Surprised, dazed almost, they turned to face the new enemy when again they were hit on the flank, this time by General French, of the British; Franchet d'Esperey of the Fifth; Foch of the Ninth Reserves and the rest.

Von Kluck and Von Buelow, commanding the German right, were staggered. They fought desperately and tried to rally their armies but Foch, teacher of tactics at St. Cyr, the French West Point, outmaneuvered them, drove a murderous wedge into their lines and sent them back almost in panic under a storm of French 75 shells.

The German "battle without a tomorrow" has failed. The morrow is here and with it signal defeat. The battle of the Marne is over and the French have won.

In Paris the news was hailed as the announcement of a miracle. Each day some 40,000 or 50,000 people had been abandoning the city, expecting the immediate entrance of the Germans. It was known that the Kaiser's legions were near and advancing 20 and 30 miles a day. The French and British seemed powerless to check them and an irredeemable disaster appeared inevitable.

To the few, however, sharing the confidence of General Joseph Joffre, the French commander-in-chief, the victory is gratifying but not surprising. It comes as the logical result of his plans made immediately after Charleroi.

When war was declared Joffre knew he would have to face what the Germans called a "brusked attack." Just where this would come he had no idea. Adapting one of Napoleon's maxims "to engage everywhere, then see," he spread out his men and endeavored to obtain contact with the enemy. The mass move came through Belgium and Luxembourg, the point least expected, with the result that Joffre's reserves were a long way off. Greatly outnumbered and without sufficient time to bring up reinforcements, Joffre, who had felt the enemy's strength at Charleroi determined to fall back toward his reserves while his reserves advanced to meet him. Furthermore he profited by the lessons of 1870 which were distinctly to the effect that conquered territory may be redeemed but a beaten army ends all hope. No matter what happened, he resolved to keep his armies intact; to refuse all offers of battle until such a time as he deemed the chances were in his favor. Not even to save Paris would he allow himself to engage in a decisive struggle if he felt the moment had not come.

Hoping the favorable moment might come somewhere along the Champagne tablelands, Joffre started the formation of a new army at Amiens. This was the Ninth Army, under General Maunoury. The trains transporting this army moved only at night and, I am told by staff officers, the Germans were not aware of its formation.

But the German advance was too rapid. The new army was not more than half formed when Amiens had to be abandoned. Lille, Arras, and most of northern France was overrun so, again by night, the army of Maunoury hastened back to Paris where its enrollment was completed.

Sept. 2 the Germans were in sight of the capital. Their right was a few miles to the north of Paris while their line continued on southward, eastward and northeastward. Ulian patrols reached the Seine to the southeast of Paris and within a few miles of the Seine to the north-west.

The German general staff had to decide whether they would take Paris immediately or to follow up and crush an army which they believed to be demoralized, routed and incapable of serious opposition. They chose the latter alternative—the only proper one from a military point of view, for with the allied army crushed Paris would fall like ripe fruit into the first hand that shook the tree.

So, instead of continuing directly southward and entering Paris, Von Kluck's army in conjunction with Von Buelow's army turned eastward to deliver the knockout blow. Joffre's longed-for minute had come. His air scouts reported that Von Kluck's masses had faced the east and that Von Buelow's were pouring across the Marne at many points. He sent for Sir John French, commanding the British. The British in the forest of Crecy and extending eastward toward Coulommiers, would keep in touch with the Fifth Army under d'Esperey. Other army commanders were ordered to begin their attack at dawn, Sept. 6, Joffre, in his order of the day, concluded with:

"An army which can no longer advance, must hold, and if it can not hold, must die."

At daybreak on the 5th Maunoury's reserves struck, full in Von Kluck's flank. Evidently the latter's intelligence department had failed signally.

Had he known of the presence of Maunoury's army in and north of Paris, and at least eight divisions strong, he would not have dared turn his flank to the way he did. I am told he thought, as did Von Buelow, that there was only one army in Paris and that it would be held for the capital's defense. As a matter of fact there were two—the Army of Paris and the Army of Maunoury.

In the meantime the British, with five infantry divisions and five brigades of cavalry, were moving north-eastward with comparatively little resistance. By night they had reached a position astride the Grand Morin, their right being at Dagny, on the Aubein river.

Further east the fighting had been much hotter for here it was a frontal attack. D'Esperey had to carve his way forward and he did not get far on the 6th. He had against him the bulk of Von Kluck's army; the Westphalians, Hanoverians and Brandenburgers. Foch, with his Ninth Reserves east of D'Esperey not only had Von Buelow opposing him and the right wing of Von Hausen's Saxons. The Duke of Wurtemberg met attack with attack when Lengie's Fourth Army struck at his rear Vitry and did his best to break through. The result was a standstill fight.

Sarrail, around Verdun, had been less lucky, for the German Crown Prince and the Crown Prince of Bavaria struck with all their might hoping to take Verdun, the forts along the Heights of the Meuse and so turn the French right. They gained some ground, though they failed in their greater task.

On the 7th the fighting was resumed more fiercely than ever. Maunoury's flanking movement went forward with a dash and the British were carried along with it. The plateaux along the river Oureq were piled high with German dead. Elsewhere, despite desperate attacks the French merely held their own.

The 8th seems to have been the critical day. Maunoury kept up his advance with the British on his right while Foch saw the opening for his wedge. During the night he continued his maneuvers so that at dawn on the 9th he was pounding away at a large gap between Von Hausen and Von Buelow, at the same time, with his left he, too, struck at Von Buelow's right, uncovered by Maunoury and the British.

The retreat of Von Buelow imposed. Caught in a pocket only a rapid retreat could save him and his army. This he did very cleverly. Staff officers declare only a genius could have extricated himself, for, at times, under violent shellfire from the French 3 inch rapid-fire field pieces, his troops showed signs of panic.

The retreat of Von Kluck was followed by that of Von Buelow and the other commanders eastward to the Vosges. The German army is expected to make a stand on the Aisne, north of which a high tableland offers what is considered one of the greatest defenses in Europe. Unless they hold there it is believed they will lose all they have gained.

RICH SHEEPMAN LEAVES BEFORE TRIAL STARTS

CHARGED WOMEN WITH FORGERY—BAKER AUTHORITY SEEKING HIM.

BAKER Ore, Sept. 9.—Frank Pollita, complaining witness against Mrs. M. J. Collins, Blanch Wilson and Julia Moore, charged with forgery, left town before his preliminary hearing, so he failed to appear in court. A bench warrant was issued for his arrest to compel him to testify. It is believed he left for Sparta, and a deputy sheriff armed with a warrant left for there.

Pollita, a wealthy sheepman, is believed to have repented making charges against the women, and intimated by their threats, fears to appear against them, as their story of his relations with them is such that Attorney Godwin believes he will not go through with his prosecution.

"He will have to appear in court, at any event," said District Attorney Godwin, "after starting this trouble. If he corroborates the allegations in the complaint, we will convict the women of forgery easily, and may involve others before we get through."

D. W. Youkus, a former preacher, is named as a witness by the women, and he expresses willingness to tell what he knows. Pollita claims to have been bilked out of almost $1000 by the women the last few months. They are still in jail unable to secure bonds.

Clarence Vandiver, who is employed on the Roy New ranch near Youkus, had a narrow escape from burning to death in a gasoline fire during the sweltering heat of a few days ago. He was pumping gasoline from a large tank into a five-gallon can when it exploded and set his clothes on fire. He took refuge in a large watering trough near by and saved himself.

A wagon upon which the gasoline sat burned down and a full tank went down with the wagon without lighting.

Mr. Vandiver claims that he was not smoking at the time and that no fire was near and the pump being overheated by the sun is the only reason he could assign for the explosion.

HERO OF WORLD'S SERIES RELEASED BY BALTIMORE FEDS

This smile has faded. Charles Albert Bender, the grim Chippewa chief, and one time pitcher for the Philadelphia Athletics in the halcyon days when the team was winning world's series, has gone the way of all fading stars. The Baltimore club of the Federal league has tendered the Redskin his unconditional release.

Last fall Bender completed his twelfth season in major league ball and he pitched his last game for the Athletics in the first of the world's series contests with the Boston Braves. Last November Mack asked for waivers on Bender, but the Federal league magnates finally signed the Indian on Dec. 5.

This season he has shown but little of his old time pitching craft and he has been let out by Manager Knabe only after he himself admitted that he was no longer capable of baffling the opposing batsmen.

Bender learned his baseball at the Carlisle Indian school, entering that institution in 1900. During the summers he worked on a farm in Lawrenceville and pitched for the Lawrenceville team. In 1902 he was signed by the Harrisburg team where Connie Mack discovered him and brought him to the Athletics the following season. 1910 was his best year.
