Round-up Poet is Here.
Richard Warriner of Portland, author of "The Buckaroo," "The Buckeroes" and "Long Tom", verses inspired by the Round-up, arrived yesterday noon from Salt Lake where he had been visiting and is one of the most interested spectators at the Round-up. When the first railroad was being built through this country he was stationed at Cayuse for a time and later at Meacham so that this section is not strange to him.

Claud Penland Hurt.
Claud Penland, director of parade for the Round-up, came near being a victim of his own parade this morning when just at the start of the parade his horse fell with him on West Court street. The pavement had just been sprinkled and was slippery which caused Penland's mount to fall. Though knocked unconscious for a few minutes, Penland recovered quickly and though suffering from his fall rode through the parade.

The driver put on another tire, cranked up and drove off without leaving his name.—Walla Walla Union.

Just at the close of the Round-up parade this morning guests at the Hotel Pendleton were startled to see a bevy of horsemen ride through the door of the hotel bar and line up alongside the bar. There were a half dozen in the group and the performance attracted much attention. Ed McCarty, manager of the famous Cheyenne Frontier Days, and William Powell, also of Cheyenne, were with the brigade which was headed by H. W. Collins, exhibition director for the Round-up.
