Veterans Approve of Scenes in Great War Drama

Sherman's March to the Sea. Scene from "The Birth of a Nation." Coming to the Oregon Theater, three days, starting April 27th.

In the list of accurate battle scenes and maneuvers in Griffith's "Birth of a Nation," noted pictorial drama of the civil war, which visualizes the problem of slavery and state sovereignty, now attracting large audiences in several of the large cities, and which Manager Welch is to bring here for presentation at the Oregon theater Thursday, April 27th, for three days, is an accurate reproduction of Sherman's march to the sea.

It depicts realistic views of the union troops passing through Georgia, the burning of Atlanta, etc. Sherman's move was one of the decisive acts of the long, hard-fought war as it divided the south and took away food supplies which were needed for the support of the confederate army.

The siege of Atlanta and the flight of the population to the country is also realistic production of a historical event. In this and in all of the battle scenes, D. W. Griffith, the producer, obeyed the directions of military experts who mapped out the movements of the union and confederate armies as described in the accurate reports in the possession of the United States government. In fact, many weeks were spent in the requirement of data for the staging of the battle scenes. Many old soldiers have witnessed and approved of these reproductions, saying that they recalled with vivid impressiveness the hard-earned experiences which they endured in army service.

Portions impress one with a lasting sense of the suffering due to hunger, showing Confederate soldiers on the firing line eating sparingly of short rations of parched corn—in another the capture of a supply train in an impressive lesson of the hardships of war.
