Of all the furnishings of home there are none more important than table silver.

The refined habits of our civilization rebel against inferiority or make-believe upon the dining table.

The best accoutrements for our eating and drinking are something more than utility or luxury—they are necessities.

The family silver has always occupied a place of honor by its appreciated usefulness, beauty and lastingness. It is the symbol of refinement, of culture, and of good breeding. It comes first in the list of dining room appointments. It is the last possession poverty will give up. Home without it is unthinkable.
