Featured at the Pastime today is the Jungle Flash Light, a clever picture of African life with Margaret Gibson and William Clifford in the leading roles. Salvation Joan, Pastime Sunday and Monday.

Salvation Joan is a society girl who wears of the empty life of society when she realizes the suffering, misery and poverty that exists in the great city in which she lives. In spite of the opposition of friends and relatives she joins the Salvation Army, but conceals her identity. The poor people love her and regard her as a benevolent angel who has descended into their midst to be one of their own.

Joan is attracted by Bill, who, she thinks, is one of a gang of rough characters of the saloon and gambling places, but who really has more sterling qualities of manhood concealed within him if they could be brought out.

In a fight started at a Salvation Army meeting by the rowdies, Bill comes to the rescue of Salvation Joan. In spite of the risks of great danger to himself, this wins the gratitude of Salvation Joan and the result is that Bill becomes a regular attendant at the Salvation Army services. It is hard to keep love and religion from mixing.

As a society girl, Salvation Joan had previously broken off her engagement to Phillip Ralston because somehow she could not place confidence in him. This distrust was well borne out when Ralston's association with gangsters were accidentally revealed to her one day when she chanced to discover him leaving a meeting with a crowd of them.

To promote his sinister ends, Ralston traps Madeline Ellison, sister of Joan and the wife of Ambassador Ellison, and threatens that if they expose him he would scandalize Madeline. The situation becomes more and more complicated and reaches its final climax when "Bill" after an evening of thrilling adventures, turns out to be a secret service man and arrests Ralston as a spy, saving the country from war. Ralston, in an attempt to escape, is shot and killed.

"Bill's" heroism wins the heart of Salvation Joan and both their identity and vow they love each other just as sincerely as when each thought the other a humbler person.
