FIGURES IN THE GREAT EIGHT-HOUR CONTROVERSY

Lines in the great legal battle between almost a million organized railroad workers on one side and the organized power of railroad capital on the other are rapidly drawing close, with the legality of the Adamson eight-hour day as the immediate issue. And here are the men who will figure most prominently in what promises to be one of the greatest and most historic legal battles in the history of industrialism in America.

Representative W. C. Adams, of Georgia, chairman of the house committee on interstate and foreign commerce, is the father of the Adamson act making an eight-hour day compulsory on the railroads of the country, and which act is generally credited besides having prevented a general strike of railroad workers, with having done much to re-elect President Wilson.

Samuel Rea is president of the Pennsylvania Railroad and one of the leaders among the railroad managers who are contesting the legality of the Adamson law.

J. S. KEENEY DIES IN LANE COUNTY

J. S. Keeney, who was here many years ago died at Springfield, Lane county, last week. The following account of his death is from the Eugene Register:

John S. Keeney, known as "Blind Johnny," and one of the best known characters in Lane county, died at Springfield Thursday night after an illness covering a period of more than a year. He was aged 61 years and was a native of Lane county, being the son of Eli Keeney, one of the early pioneers. He leaves two sisters, Mrs. Aletta Richard of Springfield and Mrs. Ruth Fletcher of Pendleton, and a brother, Silas Keeney, of Springfield.

"Blind Johnny" was born on the Keeney donation land claim between Pleasant Hill and Clatskanie. It was there, when he was five years of age, that he was kicked by a horse, the bones of the bridge of his nose being broken and crushed against the optic nerve. From that day until his death he was unable to see daylight. He often made the remark that the only things he could remember of seeing were the green grass and his mother's eyes. It is said that such an injury in these days of modern surgery could easily have been remedied and his sight restored.
