

Social and Personal

Yesterday afternoon at the home of the bride's mother on South Main street the wedding of Miss La Verne Wisler to Earl Doane was solemnized. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Snyder of the Presbyterian church, only relatives being present. The bride was attired in a becoming dress of silver lace over white tulle. She was attended by her sister, Mrs. Gale Sturdivant of La Grande. The groom was attended by his brother, Mr. Roscoe B. Doane of this city. After the ceremony a few intimate friends called. Dainty refreshments were served. Mr. and Mrs. Doane left on No. 18 for La Grande where they will make their home.

formally for tea this afternoon, Miss Mildred Berkeley, who leaves tomorrow for the east will also be a guest and her many friends will thus have an opportunity of bidding her farewell.

GOVERNORS ARE MUM ON WILSON'S PEACE LEAGUE PROPOSALS

Twenty Statements Requested and Only Seven Reply; Most of Them Endorse President's efforts.

NEW YORK, Jan. 24.—Governors throughout the country are evidently keeping "hands off" of President Wilson's league of peace proposal. Twenty statements were requested and only seven governors replied.

James M. Cox of Ohio said: "Wilson's message marks a distinct epoch in civilization. It is farseeing and statesmanlike. It does not conflict with Washington's idea of entangling alliances. Conditions have changed since Washington's day."

E. L. Phillip, republican, of Wisconsin. "Wilson's address is timely and well worded. It will open the doors for new peace negotiations. But his suggestions regarding a peace league are impossible."

Capper, of Kansas, endorsed Wilson's efforts. Sleeper of Michigan, said he feared the international alliance Wilson suggested would mean trouble for the United States.

CANINE STARS SHOW HUMAN PERVERSITY

Booth Tarkington's Dog Characters in "Seventeen" Have More Temperament Than the Real Stars

THE novelist has an easy time of it. When he decides that his characters ought to do a certain thing he makes them do it with a wave of the pen or a thump of the typewriter key. If he wants two dogs to fight on sight, he proceeds to describe the fight. If he thinks that one of his characters should be passionately fond of apple sauce, he proceeds to picture the rapturous bliss of that person while consuming apple sauce. It is all so very simple for the novelist.

But it is a far different story for the motion picture director. His people have to actually do the things that are prescribed for them or there is no photoplay. When the story demands that two people fondly embrace, they have to do it or the effect of the picture is spoiled and everybody suspects them of having been attempting to deceive the audience in their previous love scenes. When Booth Tarkington sat down to write his novel "Seventeen" it was a very simple matter for him to picture the first meeting of Clematis, the hound dog that belonged to William Sylvanus Baxter's negro servant, and Floppit, the previous possessor that cuddled in the fair arm of the lovely Lola Pratt. Tarkington just decided that they ought to fight, and he told how they did fight. But when the Famous Players began to make an adaptation of the book for the motion picture screen Robert G. Vignola, who was placed in charge of the production, faced a very trying situation in getting two dogs that fitted the description of Clematis and Floppit and at the same time were inclined to swallow each other whole on sight. All sorts of devices were used by Vignola, assisted by Louise Huff and Jack Pickford, the co-stars of the picture, in order to induce various dogs that seemed to fit the requirements to do battle, but it looked for a time as if the incident would never be seen in this Paramount Picture. But the strategy which produced the desired result was the very simple expedient of placing the toy dog who was to play Floppit alone in a room and then ushering numerous other dogs into that room one after the other and noting the effect which the little chap had upon them. Many paid no attention to him, others barely sniffed at him, but there finally entered one who bristled, growled and otherwise made his disapproval of the toy dog manifest. He is Clematis.
