Buying at Home is not a ONESIDED PROPOSITION

The buyer should patronize home industry and the home merchant, everything else being equal. At the same time the seller must give the buyer as good value and service as possible. This way only will a community prosper in the long run.

"A One Sided Development"

Although our city has hundreds of manufacturing concerns, employing thousands of people who produce millions of dollars' worth of products each year, the amount is not proportional to our population—it does not equal the record of other cities. It is not fair to our possibilities. Why does our city show a smaller proportion in her relation between population and industrial output than other cities?

This condition should be changed. We are certainly in a favored locality; raw material in abundance, cheap power, unexcelled transportation facilities, good living conditions are ours.

The biggest lesson we have to learn—the lesson we must religiously practice and preach is this: Patronize local industries—buy goods made at home. If we unite in this effort, increased progress and prosperity for our community as a whole cannot fail to be the result.

We, as individuals, wherever possible should encourage excellence in our community by giving preference to home products. Let us each one make it a point to buy something made at home today. You will find something in every store you visit.
