Fish Hook in Finger Gives Boone Watson Trouble and Assessor His Due Revenge

Boone Watson, who lives at Thorn Hollow, is beginning to believe in divine retribution. His belief is fostered by an experience he had while out fishing a few days ago.

Mr. Watson went up Squaw Creek, whence he sent Assessor C. F. Strain on a memorable hike a few weeks ago. While far from home and alone, Mr. Watson's hook became engaged in one of his fingers. He reached for his pocket knife but had none. He felt for his glasses but had left them behind. He tried to dislodge the hook with his teeth but failed.

After considerable walking, Mr. Watson met a sign with a case knife. She lucked and sawed at the finger, but couldn't make headway and finally gave up the struggle because of chafe-heatedness. Mr. Watson decided he would have to walk home, six or seven miles, with the injured finger.

In the last he reached a camp where men with a sharp knife removed the hook. Mr. Watson declares he thought of Mr. Strain all during his ordeal and is almost convinced that his accident, in almost the same territory, was prompted by the avenging spirit of the assessor.
